Agriculture.

Live Stock Shows in Scotland.

Mr. MacDonald, editor of the North British Agriculturist, contributes an able, useful, and timely paper to the last volume of the Transactions of the Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland, on "The Advantages and Disadvantages of Breeding Stock Shows."

The good which these gatherings of live stock have done in the past is stated by the writer, and he maintains that while the beneficial influence they exert now-a-days is by no means so great as it has been, yet it successfully combats the idea which is sometimes mooted that they ought to be abolished altogether as having served their purpose. While agricultural agencies, such as agricultural experiments and the establishment of agricultural classes of various stages of advancement. To every observant farmer of Scotland will make such rapid advancement is desirable. The great name which Scotch farming has made for itself in the past all over the globe has been largely due to the qualities which have been characteristic of all classes of our countrymen, the chief of which are industry and steady application. While these will be invaluable in the future as they have been in the past, they are not sufficient of themselves to accomplish success in agricultural pursuits. Agriculture has entered on new conditions here as well as elsewhere. Special education—and that to some extent a technical and scientific character—must be combined with practical training where a young man wishes to keep himself abreast of the farming of the times. Unless facilities exist for the acquiring of this knowledge by the rising generation of farmers they must remain in the past, and it is to be regretted that it ought to be the primary object of all agricultural societies to do their utmost to assist in making provision for this being accomplished. However, shows for the exhibition of live stock and implements may still serve a useful purpose, but a decided effort should be made to free them from the abuses which attend them, and to substitute the primary object of all agricultural societies to do their utmost to assist in making provision for this being accomplished. Experiments with Live Stock.

Perhaps the most extensive and varied systematic experiments in cattle-feeding ever conducted at one place has just been entered upon at the Ontario Agricultural College. As many as fifty-one head of yearlings and two-year-old steers, with cows and heifers, have been stabled for the following purposes: In addition to repeating the important tests with corn, peas, oats, and barley, Thorley's food, and ensilage green-rot fodder in the production of beef, it is also designed again to try the effects of ensilage upon the quantity and quality of milk and butter, and, in addition to these interesting inquiries, the steaming of food versus the same in an uncooked condition will be thoroughly handled this winter. Not only so, but the three great beef breeds of the world have been put in a contest of weight-production, in such an unprecedented form that must command itself to every one. In the arrangement of this series, Prof. Brown has enlisted the personal interest of the one hundred students now enrolled. The preparation of the food, the weighing of every diet, the weighing of the water drunk, the grooming, condition of health, registration of stable and animal temperature, exercise, and the other items of such an extensive undertaking are in the hands of eight students as superintendents. Each week a bulletin will be issued to every student, showing the daily and periodical progress or other results of each animal or set of animals, the food consumed, and other necessary information. The animals are in groups of three, and there being seventeen separate experiments, the stable numbers fifty-one. The silo this year has been improved upon, and its daily temperature recorded in two ways that are already giving surprising results. Should success be obtained in the preservation of the green-rot fodder, a portable silo, holding one ton of the cut fodder, and a cut of permanent pasture is also on the card for winter use—in what manner has not yet been agreed upon.
