A RACE FOR A WIFE.

Effie Morris was the only child of a wealthy farmer, and Solomon Dreef and Jonas Bilkes were suitors for her hand. As a landed proprietor, Mr. Dreef was naturally the choice of Effie's father, while Mr. Bilkes' the stylish merchant, quite as naturally found favor in the sight of her

But Effie sided with neither party.-Her choice was George Wilson, whom she ran off with and married in spite of consequences. He was not rich, but was rising in his profession, and able to supply his Where or when she had been robbed Mr. Morris was much incensed at his daughter's disobedience, and, in the height of his displeasure, called in his able life provision for his wife, he gave the whole of his estate to a nephew whom he scarcely knew, instead of leaving it to Effie as he had all along intended. > But a heavier stroke was yet to fall. George Wilson's business called him to make a voyage abroad. The time ran out for the ship's arrival at the destined port, but she was not heard from. Days, weeks, went by. Anxious friends besieged the shipping office. At last a message came. The vessel had gone down in a storm with all on board, save such as were able to crowd into one small boat—the only one there was time to launch.

The eager listeners bent forward to catch the names of those who had escaped. At the end a piercing cry was uttered, and a slight womanly form was seen to stagger back as if under a blow. The name of Effie Wilson's husband was not in the ith a frown of dislike on his swarthy face dark lantern was thrown across the girl's that the heart-rending wail had come.

Solomon Dreef and Jonas Bilkes met one day in a small railway town in France. The former had gone abroad to look after an inheritance, the latter on some affair of business. They met cordially; for though both heard that Effie Wilson was now a widow, her father's broad acres having passed to other hands, neither, at present, felt the slightest jealousy. Asthey stood chatting pleasantly the afternoon express came thundering by.
A man, seemly intoxicated, staggered upon the track before it. Warning shouts failed to arrest his attention. The whistle shrieked, the bell rang, the brakes were manned, but in vain. The momentum was too great to be checked suddenly, and in a few seconds the unfortunate man lay a crushed and shapeless mass of lacerated, bleeding flesh. The face alone remained undisfigured As Dreef and his companion, who pressed forward with the others, caught sight of the features, they both started. "Do you recognize him?" inquired the

"No. Do you?"

Both lied, for they both knew that it was the face of Wesley Hythe, the nephew in whose favor Mr. Morris had disinherited his daughter. The same thought had flashed at once upon the minds of thse two scheming men. Wesley Hythe was too young and improvident to render it at all likely he had left a will, and if not Effie Wilson would inherit as his next of kin.

"Do you intend returning to America soon?" inquired Mr. Dreef, as he and Mr. Bilkes entered the next train to Paris. "Not for some weeks," replied the

"Nor I either," returned the other. Then they talked of their travels, the sights they had seen—everything, indeed

At Paris they separated, promising to dine together next day. But that night both took the train for Calais, without meeting however; nor did they encounter on the boat crossing the channel, for both were seasick in their staterooms; to New York.

"Ah! quite surprised to see you Dreef," said Bilkes, as they shook hands, "thought you was going to spend some time in Paris."

"So I was," replied Dreef, "but an unexpected telegram has changed my

"She is, sir." "Is she in?" "Step into the parlor, an' I'll ask." Mr. Dreef hung his hat on the rack and accepted the invitation. In a few minutes a slender little lady, with a pretty face in spite of its paleness, made her appearance.

Mr. Dreef at once recognized Effie Wilson, and extended his hand. "I have called," he began, "to offer I would have done so before, but I only heard of it on a trip I was compelled to take to Europe, and from which I have for over forty years been recognized by eminent medical authorities as the most powerful blood purifier in existence. It frees the system from all foul humors, enriches and strengthens the blood, removes all traces of mercurial treatment, and proves itself a complete master of all scrofulous diseases. A Recent Cure of Scrofulous Sores. "Some months ago I was troubled with scrofulous sores (uleers) on my legs. The limbs were badly swollen and inflamed, and the sores discharged large quantities of offensive matter.
