> > Preparatory to weaning, the colt should be accustomed to a box stall a short time each day, lengthening the period daily, says the Ohio Farmer. They should also be taught to feed, to be handled, and to become familiar with all surroundings before totally depriving them of the dams. The most important thing is the feed. Always feed scalded bran and flaxseed a month or so before weaning and the colt will not require so much feed after weaning will supply every want, keeping up the strength and condition.

In setting cabbage plants, it is better to pull, or cut off all, of the large leaves, leaving only the small central ones. The outer leaves are of no service to the young plant, for the reason that the roots cannot supply them with moisture, so that they wilt and die. In an experiment, made several which were set with their leaves en-
