her husband had used to her. Evelyn succeeded so far as to induce her to dry her tears and make as careful a toilette as the state of her wardrobe permitted. The obnoxious papillottes were removed, the soft hair curled, her cheeks faintly tinged with rouge, and a more becoming dress assumed.

By the time this was accomplished, all traces of her previous emotion had disappeared, and Augusta glanced approvingly at the person reflected in the mirror. But her complacency vanished when she accidently caught a glimpse of the fresh
