British arms, and re-establish British prestige in Egypt. The excitement in England is intense. There is a sweeping demand that Khartoum be retaken at any cost, and Gordon's fate discovered. The Government, to satisfy public feeling, have given Wolseley of England resound with the notes of preparation for a most vigorous renewal of the war and in a short time thousands of British soldiers will be en route to the battle fields of the Soudan. Public feeling in England against the Government, has been intensified by the recent disaster, and Gladstone and his vacillating Cabinet will doubtless be dismissed as soon as Parliament meets. It was a suicidal policy to send Wolseley to conquer the myriads of Arabs, with a mere handful of men, and it is felt that the prestige of England in Egypt, must be maintained at all hazards. The force that will be sent to the Soudan, will effectually wipe out the rebels and and restore law and order in that unfortunate country. The British Government are making preparations to send 10,000 men to the Soudan, and military critics think the campaign will last eighteen months.
