Literature. THE FATAL ERROR.

One brisk November morning, about the beginning of the present century, two young men set out together, from a certain city on the banks of the Rhine, to seek the headquarters of the French army then encamped some forty miles down on the borders of the same stream. These young men were intimate friends and col. lege-mates, and had just received their place. appointments as assistant surgeons in the army to which they were travelling.

They were, of course, both French citione and twenty, with all the faults, vani- his own pillow, saying, lightly: ties, enthusiasms, and other peculiarities, good as well as bad, of their age and your instruments, I on my gold." country.

Their hearts and purses were equally strangers were fast asleep. light, and they went gaily along, chatting and singing, ogling the pretty peasant girls, and "chaffing" the clodhoppers, until, just at dusk, they arrived in sight of the village in and around which the staff and headquarters of the army were established.

The young surgeons, after a moment's consultation, resolved not to report themselves till the next morning, in order that they might enjoy one more night of liberty, good cheer, and soft slumbers, and therefore betook themselves to an which they perceived by the wayside, on the outskirts of the village. This inn had already attracted their attention while on a distant eminence, from its singular ap pearance and the striking contrast it presented to the general landscape. It stood between the road and the river, and was painted a deep vermillion from roof to foundation, looking all the more vividly red beside the dull leaden hue of the stream, and the pale-brown-gray tints o the autumn woods and fields.

The circumstance of its strange colo had long given this hostelry the soubrique of THE RED HOUSE, and each successive proprietor, therefore, was careful to keep the sanguinary tint fresh, by a new coat of vermillion at proper intervals

The present master of the Red House hearing the feet of the two travellers' horses, appeared on his threshold to wel come them

"By my faith, gentlemen," cried he "had you arrived but a little later, you would have had to take a bed with the sky for a counterpane. Every room in my house is full, and if you are anxious for a good night's rest, I must give you my own chamber : it is all I have to offer Ave. even my stable is full of bipeds, and I can only give your horses a bundle of straw in the corner of the yard; still, this is better than you will find-

" Oh, never mind the beds just now! interrupted Claude Rollard, the quicker spoken of the two young men; "let us hear about the supper. We have eaten nothing since the morning!' "Yes, the supper is the important thing, for the moment," added Jacques Leval-Claude,s companion. "What are the chances for a comfortable digestion, mine "Oh! as to that, you shall eat and drink cried Claud; and dismounting, the two travellers resigned their steeds to the inn keeper, (who had vainly yelled for his tired hostler,) and entered the room.

The principal room of the inn was full of guests, and that portion of it not occupied by their opaque bodies, was obscured by a dense cloud of tobacco smoke, through which the two young travellers tracked by a sound like the regular "drip, could scarcely at first see anything or any person distinctly.

After they had been seated awhi,e at a small table in a corner, however, their eyes grew more accustomed to the foggy atmosphere, and they could perceive the strange mixture of German, French, and Jewish faces, civillians and officers around them, as well as the trim figure of the hostess, and the more portly one of her spouse. The other guests gradually retired, and by the time the supper of the two young surgeons was before them, eleven o'clock chimed from the village church-bell, and the room was empty. At this moment, amid the various sounds of opening and shutting doors, stamping of horses in the yard, and the thousand other echoes of an inn at that hour, the host heard rude voices, and the rubbing of a boat against the little landing place at the back entrance which opened on the river. He immediately went out, and returned almost instantly, ushering in a short, stout man, behind whom came two ly swoon prone into the crimson pool at boatmen, carrying a heavy valise and some his side. other luggage, which they deposited on the floor, and departed upon receiving their fee, while the innkeeper made fast the principal room of the inn, and surthe door after them.
