An Unfounded Claim.

Mr. Blair, in the interest of himself and the party that supports him in the Assembly, ought to muzzle the Telegraph. Day after day, the country is told by our contemporary of the great Liberal victory achieved by Mr. Blair in the local elections last April. Mr. Blair himself knows, and admits, that his striking success on that occasion, was not the head of the people. Well, when we reflect, that if the Globe had its way, there would not be any Government House, and that if the Globe's ideas prevailed, Sir Leonard and Lady Tilley and Lady Tilley would not be in a position to dispense the hospitalities of Government House, in addition to discharging the responsible official duties connected therewith, we do not wonder at the Globe. The Farmer makes no objection to being termed a "country paper," or "bucolic."

The Farmer is theit by the Globe had its way, there would not be any Government House, and that if the Globe's ideas prevailed, Sir Leonard and Lady Tilley suppose Sir Charles Russell took the deciding line when he said in his opening address to the jury: "This is not a case for apologies; it is a case for stating facts." It came out that Lord Johnston. Colin, who has tried directorship and other inancial experiments, is now a lawyer. He has had an experience by which he may pro-fit, and will, I dare say, rise in his profession -he is only 33. But the stage is what he is best fitted for. No comedian could have played this difficult part better. He has many natural advantages. Alone among "those Campbell's," Lord Colin is good looking. Under medium height, like all his brothers, his figure is slight enough to ennance his stature. He has had the high forehead which the Duke Argyle has bestowed not too soon to suggest to the counties on all his sons, and it is full at the temples and upper angles. Brown hair, sweeping in a well considered curve across this fine brow; candidates in the field that they ought to light brown eyes, sometimes sinister in expression; flowing moustache, lighter still; high class features. His bearing would, I doubt not, strike the same menial as equally high class, and this verdict would be confirmfort should be made to secure strong ed by better judges. Lord Colin really has an air of refinement, of good breeding, of distinction. For the purpose of his cross-ex-amination, he gave us his very best society manner. If he were pressed too hard, a faint flush came into his cheeks, and the tone of the answer became slightly, very slightly supercilious. But he adopted in the beginning and kept to the end, the note of the drawing-room. The voice was never raised there was no gesture beyond clasping the hands or caressing the two gold rings which he wore on the third finger of the left hand the attitude was correct, or was until the tion, one elbow generally the left, resting on the oak rail of the witness box.
