A CURIOUS WEAPON.

In the war of 1870 the German military authorities made good use of the thorough information they had previously gained as to the condition of the army and armaments of France. Since then the French and all other War Departments have been very careful to conceal their preparations. Hence it is really impossible to decide how much truth is in the report that Russia has developed a new, strange and fearful weapon from experience gained by some of her officers who served against the Chinese in the Kashgar campaign Everybody knows that the Chinese formerly used missiles to which the English gave the unpleasant name of "stinkpots." The composition with which they were filled is not exactly known, but there can be little doubt that it diffused an aroma more vile than the whole seventy famous odors of the city of Cologne. The new and interesting rumor is that the Russian military authorities have discovered a composition even more awful than that to which we refer, and are now filling millions of shells with it. Our of these shells, it is said, will, if exploded in a town, force every haman being within half a mile to withdraw. The odor is said to be simply unendurable. A doz-n sh-lls dropped into as many quarters of a large city will depopulate it, or make every inhabitant and DAVIS' PAIN-KILLER is the best medicine soldier sicker than a small boy after ten minutes' smoking of blackstrap in an old Man, like buckwheat cakes, always feels tobacco pipe. To this condition a whole P. T. Barnum says that during his life as army may be reduced by half an hour's artila showman he has received over $80,000,000 lery practice. Then the Russians will advance and capture their enemies. This plan American papers are making a fuss about would be impracticable if the ingenuity of the quantity of Canadian silver in circulation certain Moscow savants had not discovered an antidote to the effects of the odor.
