A LIFE IN TWO SQUARES. CHAPTER XXV. He did not realize how long he had been sitting there musing over these things until a slight movement of Miss Grafton's aroused him.

"My lord," he said, as he held him by the hand and courteously addressed him by the title which more rightly belonged to himself. "I regret more than I can express the necessity that brings me here to-day. Believe me, I care little for the advantages I may reap upon the establishment of my claim compared with the vindication of my innocent mother, who suffered so long in silence and obscurity."

"You respect you? Would she honor you? Would she be proud to call you friend, as she once said, if convinced of the right, you willfully do wrong?" he said, with uplifted head, and speaking aloud as if to himself.

A Common Cold. The last word was spoken in a hoarse whisper, and his companion realized that all the force of a mighty will had been employed to let him know how entirely he relinquished everything and acknowledged his superior claims, even to Editha Dalton's love.
