I've mourn'd the dark long night away With bitter tears and vain regret, Till, grief-sick, at the breaking day

I've left a pillow cold and wet. I've risen from a restless bed, Sad, trembling, spiritless and weak, With all my brow's young freshness fled,

With pallid lips and bloodless cheek. Hard was the task for aching eyes So long to wake, so long to weep; But well it taught me how to prize

That precious matchless blessing, sleep. I've counted every chiming hour While languishing 'neath ceaseless pain; While fever raged with demon power,

To drink my breath and scorch my brain

And oh! what earnest words were given! What wild imploring prayers arose! How eagerly I ask'd of heaven A few brief moments of repose!

Oh! ye who drown each passing night In peaceful slumber, calm and deep, Fail not to kneel at morning's light And thank your God for health and sleer

I was soon settled in an obscure corner of a dingy, ill-lighted, illventilated court house, which would have been ill smelling, too, had it not been for the scent wafted from the numerous ladies who were present. One of these, a buxom female obstruction who ought to have known better, was just in front of me, and blocked my view with an enormous bonnet. I could not see the prisoner or his counsel, or even the clock over his head, at which the people kept looking eagerly as the hour fixed for the re-
