The senior Belcher was a grayin one leg; his two sons were stout young men, in the prime and vigor of life, and his daughter was a comely lass of twenty. At the breaking out of the war, the sons espoused the cause of freedom, and enlisted in the American army; and having served out their time, they were offered commissions, which they accepted—the elder a captaincy and the younger a lieutenancy-after which, for three long years they only came home once on a short furlough. Eleven months had passed since their last visit, which brings us to the date we wish to present to notice.

The family of Mason also consisted of five persons—the father mother and three the singular precautions of the suspicious sons—the youngest an invalid. The father was a hale, stout man of forty-five, and his first and second sons were like him, and the three were much given to dissipation. They were men without principle,
