A great change gentleman's companion; Mowatt, 2nd, 100 had been wrought in the man in the six months since he left New York.

Perched on the topmost round of success in his peculiar line, George Francis Train Cready, 2nd, 17 feet 5 inches, pair opera was acceded to be the champion crank of all Christendom when he conceived the hallucination of going to the Province of New Brunswick in Canada. Friends advised him to be wary of the undertaking and be jealous of the reputation he had so honestly earned, but his waywardness proved his ruin. He went down to New Brunswick utterly heedless of the fact that there were cranks in that country when he was a sensible man, and a sharp, bright lot of cranks they were. Mr. Train saddened and subdued, is to-day a living example of their superiority. His trip was sheer madness. He had nothing to gain by it. His reputation in this country was assured. Even had he succeeded in eclipsing those provincial cranks no honor would have come to him. He fought gallantly for his position, but that is the only consolation he has. Whatever of respect that brings he is entitled to, but Train is no more king.

His first tilting ground was in the old loyalist city of St. John, New Brunswick. It is a pretty place and seems to be sleeping and innocent, but it generally keeps an eye on a stranger, and if it should catch him in the act of putting on airs it at once proceeds to wake itself up and shake him off. It has no single crank who is particularly brilliant, but it has as efficient a corps of all round men in that line as any city on the continent. It was unfortunate for Mr. Train that he chanced to visit that city. He lectured there. The first night he didn't have any audience, owing to a slight misunderstanding among the inhabitants as to what Train had come. The arrival of even a railroad train is a matter of no little gossip [there, and, therefore, when the dodgers were sent around announcing, "The great Train is here; come to the lecture," very few heeded it. They concluded that some neighbor crank was playing a joke White Cottons, on them and they didn't go. The papers next day aroused them. Nattural pride dictated that no foreign crank should come to uxult over them. They attended his lecture the following evening. When Mr. Train beamed upon them in an up from all parts of the house. They had "caught on" to him, and a rising young lawyer, seeing an opportunity to gain popularity for himself, stood up and offered a box of cigars to the one that would through a PARKS' WARPS,

Mr. Train was surprised at the perfectly democratic way in which he had been received. He was more surprised when, as the performance progressed, the boys cried at his witty passages and laughed deliriously at his solemn maledictions. The bean shooters LOWEST asserted themselves gradually until Mr.

He left St. John in disgust, and went to a little village, delightful in summer, called Sussex. There he found a weekly newspapers called the Record, and at once offered his services as assistant editor. The assistant editor of that paper, like those of weekly papers in this country, was the boy who ed, and who delivered the paper to the subsaribers; but Mr. Train paid the boy his salary, and bought himself some lead pencils and paper and went to work. He made a corner grocery and come in contact with the local champions. The latter had nothing but
