Still, the watch was there; the man might return to look for it. Our fears awoke again at this idea.

"What is to be done now?" asked Wilfrid. "Our shortest plan will be to go back at once to the Black Forest. I have no wish to play any more doublebass. You can do as you choose--"

"But why? What should make us go back. We have done no crime." "Hush! speak low!" whispered he. "The work crime alone is enough to hang us if any one heard. Poor devils like us serve as ammunition for others. Were they only to find this watch

"Come Wilfrid," said I, "it is no use to lose one's head. I dare say a crime has been committed last night in the neighborhood, it is more than probable; but, instead of flying, an honest man should aid justice; he should-" "But how aid it? how?"

"The simplest way will be to take the watch to-morrow to the provost and tell him what has taken place." "Never, never! I would not dare touch the watch.' "Very well; I will go myself. Come, let us go to bed again.

"No; I cannot sleep any more." "As you will-light your pipe then,

As soon as day dawnel, I took the watch from the table. It was a very fine one, with two dials-one for the hours, the other for the minutes. Wilfrid seemed, however, by this time to have regained his as-urance.

Just as you choose," I replied. "Besides, it would seem strange for a man of my age to send a child." "Oh, yes, Wilfrid; I understand."

I saw that his self-esteem had driven him to this resolution. He would have been ashamed to own to his comrades that he had shown less courage than I.

He took the watch, and we descended the stairs with grave faces. Passing through the alley which leads to the street Sainte-Christophe, we heard the clinking of glasses, and knives and forks At the same time I recognized the voices of old Bremer and his two sons. "Faith, Wilfrid," said I, "a good
