

Jennie's Choice.

A sinking sun. "Bang!" roared the old brass cannon on the long pier at Rockaway beach.

"Cast off the bow-line!" shouted the captain; and with the parting salute the beautiful steamer sped swiftly and merrily over the waters, carrying its load of pleasure-seekers towards their destination.

Two fine looking gentlemen were seated on the forward part of the deck, watching the droll antics of a quartette of negro minstrels who were trying to amuse the passengers.

"Marks," spoke the youngest of the two, "to-morrow I have a difficult case to attend to in the surgical line, and I need your assistance. Now promise, old fellow, that to-morrow morning, at half-past ten, sharp, I shall see you at my office."

"All right, North, I will render you all the assistance I can."

The boat arrived at the pier, and our two friends were only too glad to leave the over-crowded boat.

"Don't forget, half-past ten to-morrow. Sorry you are not going my way, else you might ride with me."

"Never mind; here is my car. Good-by!"

Dr. North rolled away in his carriage, while his brother in profession rode along in the car towards his home in Third St.

Miss Osborne's elegant coupe was standing at the curb stone in front of a door on which a silver plate bore the name of "James North, M. D.," and Miss Osborne's liveried coachman sat solemn and stiff on the box, having all he could do to manage the restless pair of bays; altogether making an aristocratic, imposing picture, to which Dr. North's handsome brown eyes wandered very often, as, in his office from his seat by the window, he was talking to Miss Osborne.

Not that they young lady was not worth all his attention—all the attention any man could pay her—aside from her position in society and her almost unimpaired health; for a sweeter face was never lifted in girlish enthusiasm than hers, as her large blue eyes glowing brightly, her voice thrilling and earnest, she was relating to Dr. North and his friends a case of suffering and sorrow she had come across on one of her charity visits, and in her sweet girlish way, asking for their subscriptions on her list for the benefit of those suffering ones.

Dr. North listened, and, looking into her lovely face, replied,—

"Certainly, I shall be delighted to do my little share, Miss Osborne. Put me down for fifty dollars on your list. Charles here will supplement it, of course."

Jennie smiled sweetly, showing a distracting dimple in one peachy cheek.

"O Mr. North! What a generous donation! Why, I had no idea you would subscribe so largely."

Dr. North bowed in response to her impressive thanks.

"It's a great pleasure that you have afforded me, Miss Osborne. I have always, since I graduated, made it a point to help the poor and sick who came under my notice, and I am heartily glad of this opportunity of being of some practical benefit to you as well as—I hope—of pleasing you."

He gave her an ardent look that brought a swift blush to Jennie's cheek, and a certain quickening of her heart-throbs.

"You are very good and kind," she answered, lifting her sweet eyes to his just second—long enough to create fresh havoc and new elation in Dr. North's heart.

Jennie turned to Dr. Marks, grave as refined, leaning against the mantle, watching the little play go on, a stem, curious look in his fine eyes. He did not give her a chance to ask him her question.

"Miss Osborne, I regret very much that I am not able to add my name to your list. If I could conveniently do so, believe me, I would not refuse; but it is impossible."

Just the merest suggestion of displeasure and coldness crept over her face as she listened, then inclined her head in her haughty way.

"I am sure you know best, Dr. Marks. Pray pardon me if I have annoyed you. I shall never forget to a grand, kind heart you possess, Dr. North. And do be sure and call at my next Thursday evening reception."

She bowed her adieu, just tinged with a little feminine pique, to Dr. Marks, into whose eyes a half amused smile crept as he gravely returned it. Then she turned to Dr. North a charming grace and bewitching smile.

He assisted her into her satin-cushioned carriage, and ventured to slightly press her hand at parting; while Jennie, her face flushed, turned impulsively to the quiet-looking elderly lady in black silk on the front seat.

Osborne the last dollar I possess in the world."

Charles looked surprised.

"You don't understand me," Dr. North said lightly. "It's just this in a nutshell: I am going to marry Miss Osborne if I can."

For a moment a frown swept across Charles's thoughtful face.

"Or her money—which?" he asked, with a little bitterness in his voice.

North interrupted him with a laugh.

"How in the world had you the courage to tell her—yes, actually tell her!—you could not afford it?"

All the nobility in Dr. Marks' nature flushed into his eyes as he spoke.

"How could you give her money that was not your own to give? Answer me that."

"I can't see it in that light," retorted North, lighting a cigar.

Then the subject was dropped, and Dr. Marks went away to his rounds of duty. Day in and day out he faithfully performed them, building by his skill a sure foundation that would one day be a glorious structure to his name and credit.

Jennie Osborne's gentle eyes were full of womanly pity and sympathy as she sat patiently listening to Susan O'Rea's story. Susan was her upstairs girl, a faithful intelligent creature, in whom and whose affairs the young mistress had always taken the warmest interest.

"And this—this—your mother has! Oh, Susie, that is dreadful! Of course it will not be right for you to leave her among as her, and of course you must go to her, and take the best care of her you can. Don't worry about her wages; they will go right on; and after the doctor thinks it is safe you must come back. What doctor do you have, Susie?"

"Indeed, and that's the sore trouble, ma'am; it's svin or eight doctors I've been after, and niver a man'll give my poor mother becase it's a bad disease, and I'll have her tuk to the hospital, not if I dies wid her in the house."

A fresh burst of sobs came from the girls quivering lips.

Jennie's bow contracted in a surprised, thoughtful frown, and a look of indignation was in her eyes.

"No doctor will go! Why I never heard of such a thing! I thought doctors always went whenever they were called. Auntie! and she turned towards the placid Mrs. Goodfellow, sewing at a window opposite. "What do you think of such cruel behavior!"

Mrs. Goodfellow looked up with a smile on her face.

"I think, simply, that Susan has happened to call the wrong physician, that is all. Have you been for Dr. North, Susan?"

The girl shook her head.

"North—North, ma'am! It's a stranger he is to me."

"He will go in a minute," Jennie said, a blush on each cheek. "He is none of your cowardly kind; he is a generous, noble, charitably gentleman, a friend of mine, and I know he'll look after your mother's case."

Mrs. Goodfellow smiled coldly.

"And then there's young Dr. Marks—my favorite, you know? He would go, I am pretty sure."

Jennie's lip curled.

"How strange you are, auntie! Why, he is the most distant, proud, stingy man I ever saw. Go! He would quicken or put his head into the fire! But Dr. North will go, I am sure. Susie, I'll put on my wraps and go to his office with you."

"And to Susan O'Rea's grateful delight, Miss Osborne accompanied her to the office door of that professional gentleman. A colored boy answered the bell, and Susan, with true Irish impetuosity, blurted out her message—the message that came so straight from her true, noble heart.

"It's the docther I be wanting—Dr. North—to go at once to see my davin' old mother, a lying sick wid the sma'pox, and—"

The loud-spoken, intense words, that Jennie could not check in their eager force, reached Dr. North's ears as he sat in his cosy office chair, with one or two choice books and a box of cigars, making it very congenial to his tastes.

"Put her out, Stephen! I don't want the small pox here. Tell her they go to the police station for a hospital doctor. Shut the door, Stephen! You don't want to catch it, do you? The low dirty Irish are getting too impudent for anything."

But Susan's sturdy arm kept the terrified dorky from obeying his orders.

"And would you let me mother die like a dog, Dr. North? For swate mery's sake go wid us, docther, and I'll pray Heaven to it."

Jennie heard a quick, angry footstep coming toward the door, and she shrank back into the darkness just as Dr. North appeared.

"Clear out, I tell you! What do you suppose I care whether the old woman lives or dies?"

The door was slammed sharply in their faces. For a second Jennie's eyes flashed, then a smile suffused her face.

"Never mind, Susie; I am just a little mistaken in Dr. North. We'll go to auntie's choice town, and somehow, I think he will go; anyhow, it is worth trying."

They met Dr. Marks just leaving his office, and at a word from Jennie, Susan addressed him, telling her pitiful story with true Irish eloquence. Dr. Marks listened very gravely.

"You are quite sure it's small-pox?"

"The old woman says so, sir. If ye would only come!"

"I'll go in half a hour. Give me your street and number, and go to a drug store and get this prescription filled, and give it to her just as soon as you get home. Keep her warm and as quiet as possible. I guess it will be all right; I'll do all I possibly can, anyhow."

He stepped back into the light of his office window and wrote a prescription, and Jennie watched him, wondering where the cold, haughty look was she had seen so plainly before. Then he went on, and Susan escorted her young mistress home, to be freighted with necessities and a few luxuries, and a month's wages in advance.

Jennie went down into the dusky parlors, and thought over the odd little adventure of the evening, and the result was, that when Dr. James North attended her Thursday evening reception, he was quite astonished at Miss Osborne's cold courtesy, instead of the charming graciousness he had expected and most ardently coveted. As he never received a second invitation, he became satisfied that something unusual had occurred; but what it was he did not find out until a year after.

Dr. Marks received an invitation to call on Miss Jennie, which he politely accepted. Indeed, his calls occurred so frequently that society was on the quiver. At last the secret was out. One morning Jennie burst into her aunt's room, her blue eyes sparkling with happiness.

"O auntie! Dr. Marks and I are going to be married!"

"Well, dear, may God bless you both, is all I can say. He is truly worthy of you."

Three months after, Miss Osborne became Mrs. Marks, and Aunt Lena was perfectly happy. Her choice had in the end proved Jennie's choice.

A Good Thing.

German Syrup is the special prescription of Dr. A. Boesche, a celebrated German Physician, and is acknowledged to be one of the most fortunate discoveries in Medicine. It quickly cures Croup, Croup, and all Lung troubles of the severest nature, removing, as it does, the cause of the affection and leaving the parts in a strong and healthy condition. It is now an experimental medicine, but has stood the test of years, giving satisfaction in every case, which its rapidly increasing sale every season confirms. A million bottles sold annually. Beware of cheap imitations of similar names, lately introduced. Boesche's German Syrup was introduced in the United States in 1863, and is now sold in every town and village in the civilized world.
