CHATHAM, - - - - MAY 13, 1880.

Death of Hon. George Brown.

Senator George Brown of Toronto has, at last, succumbed to the consequences of the wound he received on 25th March last from a pistol shot fired at him in his office by a former employe named George Bennet. The latter, it will be remembered, had been discharged for drunkenness and other misconduct from the position of assistant engineer in the Globe press room, and, on the day named, he presented himself in Mr. Brown's private office, having with him a certificate of service or character which he desired Mr. Brown to sign. Mr. Brown said he should apply to the head of the department for the certificate, as he was not aware of the length of his services. Bennett replied that the head Bennett pressed the paper upon Mr. Agent for 'Mayflower' Soap, "Drury Cove" Lime, "D. W. Hoegg & Co's." Lobsters, and Portland wrist and turned his hand downwards. He had got the weapon cocked before he The Subscriber desires to let the farm at present was seized, and he at once pulled the leased to William Sullivan, located on the trigger, but the muzzle being turned downwards, the ball struck Mr. Brown on the outer side of the left thigh, taking a slanting direction, and escaping about four inches below and towards the back of the leg. Mr. Brown thereupon closed with his assailant, and they got outside the he left him forever. door, still struggling. He pushed Bennett against the glass partition of the waiting room, at the same time calling for help. By this time the alarm had been given in in his father's office for a time; and, like the office, and, a number of employes rushing down, Bennett was seized and the

Mr. Brown was immediately removed to his residence and medical aid summoned; the wound was dressed and everything done to relieve his suffering. No fatal results were anticipated and everyone expected that he would shortly be in his editorial chair again, as usual, and able to appear in Court against his assailant. 'This it is feared," says the Toronto correspondent of the London Advertiser, "led the patient to be rather restive under his confinement, and perhaps tempted him to use greater liberties with himself in the way of transacting business and seeing friends, than was quite prudent in the circumstances. He was cheerful even to buoyancy, feeling little pain or weakness; his great vitality and exuberant energy led him to believe that he could safely accomplish what others in similar circumstances could not with propriety even attempt.

Of course, all this told eventually upon his strength, and the subsequent suppuration of the wound, added to the difficulties and increased the weakness. His extraordinary mental activity also affected him injuriously, interfering as it did with his sleep and exhausting his powers of endurance. In this way, his recognizedly great physical powers were underminded and death ensued, coming to him peacefully at two o'clock last Sunday morning." A Toronto despatch of 10th says :-"The Globe is in heavy mourning this morning, and publishes a long sketch of Mr. Brown's life which concludes: 'The grief which men of all classes and parties exhibit in regard to his suffering, and untimely death form the best tribute to his memory. He loved his country and labored for her good. The objects he set before him were high. The plans he formed were vast, and when he failed, it was from no lack of self-sacrifice on his part. The bed of death calls for other consolations than the praise of men, but it may be that his passing spirit was cheered by the thought that in the estimation of his fellow-countrymen he had not lived altogether in vain.' The Mail is also in mourning and publishes a very feeling and kindly worded bituary article, which concludes: 'In social life Mr. Brown was a genial companion. Those who have had the pleasure of knowing him in private will not soon forget the beaming countenance, the humor and the hearty bonhomie of the man. It is a sad task to have to record his untimely removal in the midst of the active labors of a busy life, with intellect undimmed and energy unabated, with harness on his back. We are sure the whole community without regard to political differences in the past, will unite with us in expression of the warmest sympathy with that wide circle of which he was at once the head, the friend and the director.' It has been ascertained from a trustworthy source that the deceased, on the 29th of April, made an ante mortem deposition, in which is briefly set forth the circumstances connected with the shooting. The statement does not materially differ from the facts already known to the public. The document, it is said, will be produced when the proper time arrives. The St. John Globe gives the following sketch of the life of Senator Brown :-"There will now be published many newspaper sketches of Brown's life None of them can do ample justice to the career of such a man. For many vears it was one of incessant warfare; and he always slept in his armor. He Tool and Drill Steel. was ever earnest in his work, and meant to overthrow the wrong which he attacked whilst many who worked with him, had purely personal aims. There has been much said about Mr. Brown's "dictatorship," about his party tyranny and so on. No doubt a great deal of this exists in the imagination of those who have continually attacked him. But anyone who knows anything of the life which Mr. Brown led in Upper Canada, would not wonder if his great powers of perseverance, pluck, energy, when combined with his determination to assail wrong doing, made him appear like a dictator, to all who would compromise with evil rather than assail it. Some time ago in talking with the writer over his early political life, Mr. Brown First class make (Davies') and well adapted for LOBSTER BOILERS, &c. Agriculture was the amusement of his leisure hours, and his ever that thirty-five years ago there Bow Park farm was specially famous for minds of certain classes in England and in Canada, as is the "Imperialism" of to-day, to make Upper Canada a colony in which the Church of England should be as influential and as potent as the Catholic Church in Lower Canada then was. The idea was to set the one off against the other. This idea, perhaps, was never expressed in words, yet it had form and shape; and Brown saw it. He saw where the assumptions of the Bishop of Toronto were carrying him, and he assailed this idea with vigor and with unbending will. Many personal friends came to see him once when he had covered the walls of Toronto with hand-bills containing extracts from a sermon in which the idea of subordination to the Church was set forth: "Is this judicious?" said they. "Won't it turn friends against us?" said others; but Brown was no temporizer, and he had little patience with those who were. While other men counted the cost to their personal interest, he never gave that a thought. As Mr. Brown talked these and similar matters over in his sanctum, it was easy to see why he was the man he was. He cared little for the personal advancement of this or that individual. His experience taught him that men would be ready to use him for their own interests, and too ready to desert him when they had accomplished their personal ends. In his own career there is one striking illustration of how little he cared for personality as against principle. For years in the politics of the old Province of Canada he had been in opposition of the department would not give the to Sir John A. Macdonald, whom he knew certificate. Had he continued then Mr. Brown grabbed him by the his association, he might have had power and influence unbounded. Together these men could have held Ontario in their grasp during their natural lives. But Brown knew that Sir John would be no less corrupt in Confederation than out of it. He knew that a change in the political constitution would not change Sir John's nature, and so the work for which he joined him having been accomplished, George Brown was the son of an Edinburgh trader, and was educated at the Edinburgh High School. He was a clerk many a pushing young Scotchman, when only twenty years of age sought to make his fortune in the great metropolis of England. He sought to do business on his own account, but soon gave that up, and started for New York, as did his father and family. In New York they started a paper, but it was not very successful and before long they removed to Toronto. His father started the Banner, a weekly paper of Independent Liberal views, and his son wrote for it, besides doing other work for the press of Toronto. In 1844 George Brown started the Toronto Globe. It at once became a great power among the people. It was ably written, fearless in attack, determined in defence, and ahead of all its contemporaries in furnishing news. It was published first as a weekly, but it soon became a daily. To-day it is, as for years it has been, the greatest paper in Canada. Naturally Mr. Brown was soon called to lead the Reform party, for he actually created that party as it is now known. Canada West was the growing power of the Province, but it was hampered and kept back by its political connections with Canada East. In the old Parliament both sections had an equal representation in the House, and corrupt Ministers had nothing to do to keep themselves in power, but to pour into Canada East the revenue collected in Canada West. In endeavoring to stop this, Brown regarded Canada East as an almost thoroughly corrupt country, and he spared nothing in attacking her people, her institutions, her religion, or her public men. He was not always judicious, nor was he always fair. But he saw no other method of warfare with which to deal with the corruption of the time. While assailing with mailed hand Lower Canada, he did not lose sight of the necessities of Upper Canada. He attacked just as vigorously her corrupt politicians, as if they were Lower Canada; and he fought as hard to settle the Clergy Reserve land question of Canada West as he did to destroy the last remnant of the Feudal Tenure principle in Canada East. His life has been a long struggle in the interest of honest government, of popular freedom and of Colonial development,

Those who are well informed in the history of twenty-five years ago, will readily recall the events which brought about the fall of Sir Allan McNab, and the assumption by Sir John Macdonald of the leadership of the Upper Canada Conservatives. But Brown soon got a majority of the representatives from that section of the Province on the Liberal side, and in 1858 he formed the Brown-Dorion Government. While its members were out of the House running their election, the House passed a vote of no-confidence. Sir Edmund Head refused to dissolve and that administration which was only five days old, came to an end. The old ministers exchanged offices, his bereaved widow and family, and with took their places in the Cabinet without having to run an election, thus effecting the celebrated Double Shuffle. Four years after the Government was again defeated, and Sandfield McDonald formed an administration of which, however, Brown was not a member, though its strongest supporter. From that time until 1864 here was a continual struggle between parties, and at last the coalition was formed which carried Confederation: Mr. Brown, then leading the Reformers, who were in a majority in what is now Ontario, helped to carry out the work. He left the Government in 1865. In 1867 he sought a seat in South Ontario, but was defeated. In 1873 he was called to the Senate: and in 1874 went to Washington to negociate a Reciprocity Treaty, for the success of which he worked most vigorously and sanguinely. In 1875 he declined the office of Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. Mr. Brown has had no equal in Canada as a leader of thought, as a moulder of public opinion, as an enlightened, independent, and fearless public man. In his lifetime the smoke and heat of political conflicts. oftentimes his own bearing, made his opponents look upon him with distorted views. Now, that he is dead, people everywhere will remember only his earnest patriotism, his regard for the public weal, and will long cherish a recollection of the stern virtues which neither position nor influence, wordly honors nor proffered titles could subdue. Outside of his public and newspaper life,

Mr. Brown was a sociable and pleasant
