Thwarted.

"Mother!" A look of tender expostulation; the swift moving of aged lips to a smile Two faces almost touched as a pair of strong arms relieved feeble ones of a heavy package of books.

"Well, dear," said the mellow old voice of Mrs. Maples, addressing her son, Lynn; "I thought you had enough to carry."

Lynn Maples' arms might have been said to be full, for he carried a drygoods bundle, a valise, a well-packed shawlstrap and an umbrella; but he took quick possession of the books, and then, after an instant's evident regret that he had no arm to offer his mother, stepped from the store door, and turned to hail a horse-car.

A fair face; that had been turned steadily toward the two since they emerged from the store, leaned forward now into the sunshine, as Annie Loraine, among the velvet cushions of her phaeton, followed with her brown, attentive eyes the movements of mother and son.

"Amusing, watching the crowd sometimes," remarked an elegant young man at her side, reconciling himself with what grace he could to Miss Loraine's inattention.

"Yes," she answered, almost inaudi-

The next moment, with a sharp cry, she had sprung from the violet cushions and was foremost in the gathering crowd.

Bewildered, and for once shaken out of his boasted repose of manner, Percy Dudley followed her.

An aged woman, her beautifully silvery hair disheveled, her black dress covered with dust, had just been lifted from the ground by a burly policeman, and was instantly claimed by a young

Will some one call a carriage?" cried Lynn Maples, his mother lying senseless across his breast.

"Take mine! pray, take mine! the astonished Dudley heard Miss Loraine saying.

His jealous eyes observed that in driving with Miss Loraine, they never passed the store where Lynn was employed without turning her glance toward the entrance; and once, when he chanced to be filling a lady's carriage with bundles, she bowed to him with a faint flush upon her lily face. From that moment Dudley hated Lynn. Though he did not for a moment entertain the thought that Miss Loraine gave him more than a passing approval, and he could see that the young man had something noble and attractive in but in allaying the irritation, subduing

"I-I admire her very much!" stammered Lynn, trembling with agitation. "Yes, certainly; I understand. Well, she's going South next week; but she'll be at the Parker Fraternity to-morrow evening. You'd better see her there, and make a sure thing of it. I'll give you my word she'll accept
