

Major Hammond's Ring.

"What's this?" cried Miss Hammond, breaking open a letter just handed to her by a servant. "You read it, Maggie, your eyes are better than mine."

Small wonder that that, indeed, seeing that Maggie is aged about eighteen, the other about sixty-five, at the very least, a pleasant-looking, well preserved spinster, with a brown resolute face and sausage curls over the forehead.

"I know," said Ralph; they are going to pull the old place down. All right; I'll do it."

Then Maggie went on to tell him about the ring, and how Miss Hammond would not have it searched for. But it is a very valuable ring—a family one, too. It would be a great pity to miss it if it really there."

Ralph agreed: "Well then mind you look for it, sir; only don't say a word to auntie, or she'll put a stop to it."

"I'm sly," said Ralph with a knowing wink, and attempted a renewal of the oscillatory process; but Maggie escaped him this time and came flying in at the dining-room window panting into the presence of her aunts.

Since she first left the room a visitor had appeared—a Mr. Boodles, a distant relative, who had inherited some of the family property, as before explained; a tall, gray-looking man, with thin, iron-gray hair, carefully brushed off his temples.

The aunts were looking rather serious, not to say frightened, and both started guiltily when they saw Maggie.

"Leave us, dear, please," said Miss Hammond gently.

Maggie had just caught the words, "No marriage at all," from Mr. Boodles, who seemed to be speaking loudly and excitedly; and she went out wondering what it all meant.

"It is very dreadful—very," said Miss Hammond. I never had much opinion of Uncle Richard, you know; but for the sake of the young people, I hope you will let it be kept a profound secret."

"Sticks of the young people!" screamed Boodles at the top of his harsh voice. "And what for the sake of old Boodles? I'm the next heir, you'll remember, please, through my maternal grandfather, Henry Hammond."

Mr. Boodles then came to Westbury to announce an important discovery he had recently made. In turning over some of his grandfather's papers he had come across some letters from General Hammond, in which it was clearly ascertained that his son Major Hammond had never been legally married to the woman known as his wife.

"What do you propose to serve, Mr. Boodles, by bringing this ancient scandal to light?" asked Miss Hammond, with agitated voice.

"End!" cried Boodles. "This is only the beginning of it. I am going to a court of law to have myself declared heir to the Westbury estates under the settlement."

"In that case," said Miss Hammond, rising with dignity, "you cannot be received on friendly terms in my house."

"Oh, very well," cried Boodles, snatching up his hat and whip and sweeping out of the room without further ceremony.

As soon as the door had shut upon him the sisters looked at each other in blank astonishment. "What a little fellow!" said Miss Hammond, with a difficulty, "said Ellen, tremulously; "but oh, to think of Boodles having discovered it!"

"We must send for Smith at once; the carriage shall go in and fetch him," said Miss Hammond, ringing the bell.

Mr. Smith of Gigglesham, was the family solicitor, and the carriage was sent off to bring him up at once for a consultation. But Smith brought little encouragement. He had heard from his father that there were curious circumstances attending Major Hammond's marriage, and if Boodles had put his finger on the flaw—Smith thought his elders would want words to express the awkwardness of the case.

"But search must be made everywhere; the evidence of the marriage must be found; the children must not suffer, poor things, and always brought up to look upon the property as their own."

"Why, they could never marry," cried Ellen; "if they could never live on Ralph's pay."

"It's altogether dreadful; and not getting married is the very lightest part of the calamity," said Miss Hammond. Smithing to set to work at once. But his inquiries had no result. He had traced out the family of the reputed wife who had been the daughter of a small farmer in the town of Miramichi; but they had never fallen to the rank of laborers, and had no papers belonging to them, hardly any family traditions.

He had searched all the registries of the neighboring parishes; no record of such a marriage could be discovered. He had issued advertisements offering a reward for the production of evidence; all of no avail. What could he do? To be sure there was a presumption in favor of the marriage; but then Boodles had documents rebutting such a presumption—again Mr. Smith shrugged his shoulders, in hopelessness of finding fitting words to represent the gravity of the matter. And then, he went on to say, "the very fact that Boodles is spending money over the case, shows that he thinks he has a strong one."

Boodles did not let the grass grow under his feet. He instituted proceedings at once, and cited all interested to appear. The thing could no longer be kept a secret; and Maggie and Ralph were told of the cloud that had come over their marriage; but they were not to know to what it pertained; "that is ours, you know Ralph, if you find it; and perhaps it may be worth a lot of money."

Ralph shook his head. He had never been able to manage on his pay when there was only himself, and there were three or four lieutenants on the list before him, so that he could not hope to be a captain for many years.

There was no use in sitting brooding over coming misfortunes; and Ralph took the dog-cart and drove over to Gigglesham, to see about the family vault at St. Crispin's. It was an occasion that agreed well with his temper; the weather, too, seemed all in keeping—a dull drizzling day.

"Don't forget the ring," Maggie said to him at parting; "that is ours, you know Ralph, if you find it; and perhaps it may be worth a lot of money."

Ralph shook his head incredulously. And yet it was possible. The ring might be there, and it might be of great value. In misfortunes, the mind grasps at the smallest alleviations, and Ralph consoled himself in his depression by picturing the finding of a splendid ruby worth ten thousand pounds. No more artillery work there—no more India.

Gigglesham boasts of several churches and St. Crispin's lies in a hollow by the river, close to the bridge. Workmen were at work on the tower, the roof was nearly off. There were great piles of sand and mortar in the graveyard. Mr. Martin, the plumber and glazier who when last heard of was smoking a cigar on the terrace.

"Ralph," said Maggie, as soon as she had submitted to a very smoky kiss—they were in the very heyday of their young loves, when kisses were appreciated even when flavored with tobacco—

"Ralph, auntie is going to give you a commission—to go and see about a vault at St. Crispin's where some of our ancestors lie."

"I know," said Ralph; they are going to pull the old place down. All right; I'll do it."

Then Maggie went on to tell him about the ring, and how Miss Hammond would not have it searched for. But it is a very valuable ring—a family one, too. It would be a great pity to miss it if it really there."
