ALEX. STEWART.

Extract from Duke of Argyle's Impressions of America-"On the Cascapediac I saw one celebrated American bird-the White-Headed Eagle (Haliaetus leucocephalus) -I must vindicate his character. He has been accused on high authority of living by piracy, not fishing for himself, but basely using his superior weight and strength to compel the Osprey or professional fishing eagle (Pandion Carolinensis) to give up its prey. On this ground, no less a man than Benjamin Franklin expressed his regret that this eagle should have been chosen as the national emblem of the United States. The great American ornithologists, Anderson and Wilson, both repeat the same story, and neither of them appear to have ever seen a whiteheaded eagle capturing his fiftny prey from the water, except, indeed, on one occasion, when an eagle was seen in most un-aquiline fashion wading in some shallow pool and picking out "Red Fins" with his bill. But I had the good fortune on the Restigouche to see a fine white-headed eagle catch a salmon for himself, by what seemed a St. Michael's Classical and bold and almost a dangerous manœuvre. About a thousand yards below our encampment, the river disappeared round | CHATHAM, - - - N. B. a sudden bend, with a very sharp current. The eagle appeared coming up stream round this bend, and flying cation, the necessary knowledge of commerce in all slowly about, thirty feet above the level industrial pursuits. of the water. Over the sharpest part of the current he hovered for a moment and then dashed into the stream. With a good glass I saw him buried deeply in the water, holding his neck well above it. It was evident he had some difficulty in getting out of it again. A few heavy and laborious flaps of his immense and powerful wings lifted him at last, but with empty talons. Very tired apparently, he flew to an adjacent bank of gravel, and sat there for some minutes to rest. But his countenance and attitude were that of restlessness, eagerness, and disappointment. He then rose and returned to exactly the same point in the air and thence made a second plunge.

It was beautiful to see his bearing in

THE Subscriber begs to inform the public that he has opened a new Tin Shop, on Cunard Street, adjoining Carmichael Bros., store, where he is prepared to attend promptly to all orders for the stream, with the water breaking against his great brown chest, and his Sheet-Iron, arched neck keeping his snowy head clear of its turbulence. This time the difficulty in emerging was much greater, for his talons were fast in a fine salmon; with a strong effort, however, his pinions again lifted him and his prey, which it seemed as much as he could do to carry to the same bank of gravel, where the struggles of the fish were soon put an end to by the eagle's terrific clutches and his powerful beak. This was all honourable work, and although the The Great Blood Purifier, Osprey was frequently to be seen on the same river I never observed it to be followed or molested by the eagle. On another day one of these magnificent birds lighted on a blasted pine which overhung the river at the height of about 500 feet and from that elevation he watched one of our party playing a salmon, an operation which he seemed to regard with great curiosity, and probably with some longing to take his part in the sport. The pure white head and the equally pure tail of this fine eagle in contrast with the dark chocolate brown of the rest of the plumage, make it one
