The Fruit Fair.

BY MARY KYLE DALLAS. It was old Mrs. Knapp's opinion that her Adam had condescended a great deal in engaging himself to Jane Hedley's girl, Melinda. And, indeed, Melinda was more flattered than she would have acknowledged, for when times were hardest, Mrs. Hedley had taken in washing, and the Knapps were never anything but farmers, and a "very good family" of the neighborhood. To be sure, the farm was small, and there was not much money in it. and Adam worked hard, as did his mother. Still, to think of being mistress of such a place, having a best parlor of the grandeur of the Knapps' front room, a spare room for company and, no doubt, black silk for church, was a great dream for Milly Hedley, who had carried home baskets of linen owned it, but she was proud of her elevation, besides being fond of Adam. He might have been a little fonder of dancing and less fond of reading, she thought; but it was "genteel," too, to be serious and given to books, and it never would have occurred to her to find fault with it, but rather to wish that she herself had more of his "genteel ways."

They had been "engaged" a good while, and she knew he would ask her to set the day soon, and had even thought over what she should wear on her wedding day.

In fact she was looking at some artificial flowers in the milliner's show-case, when she first saw that young travelling salesman. He was dressed splendidly. He wore kid gloves, and had what Milly thought a diamond pin in his cravat. The dainty bag he wore over his shoulder was only an addition to his travelling toilet, and the gay bonnet pins, of which he carried samples, were simply gorgeous to Milly's eyes. There was a stared at him without intending to lo to see these pins. They're the newest things out," said the drummer. "No charge for looking. What we strive for is to please the ladies." And he spread his wares before her eyes.

The milliner was very polite. She always fulfilled her social obligations, and it struck her to be her duty to introduce these two persons before her counter.

"Oh, Miss Hedley," she said, "this is Mr. Fairer. He's brought me sam. ples from New York for five years .-Used to be we had to go on to purchase. We've got things brought to our doors now. I'll make a list of my orders, Mr. Fairer."

She went to her desk and began to write, and Milly and young Fairer sible-"Kept company with a married talked. She was pretty and he thought her flirtable.

"I'm going to stay here three weeks," I've got-well, some other friends on from the East. I'll see you again. I'd be sorry not to, for you are good for sore eyes, you are."

It was not a delicate compliment, but Milly did not know much of the world. She understood that he meant she was When Miss Chip came back, and Milly felt that she must go, young Fairer repeated that they should be sure to see each other again. "She's going to be married soon, Mr.

Fairer," said Miss Chip, looking after "to Adam Knapp, up there on the "That don't make any difference to me, you know, Miss Chip," said Fairer. "if you mean it for a warning." "Well, no, of course it don't," said Miss Chip, "and I only meant it for a bit of news.' But for all that, at the end of a fortnight, Milly blushed and laughed to was called on the bills-the Fruit Fair, man at the store chose to call Japanese Grenadine, her sash, her scarf, her lowcut shoes and bright stockings-each | thought he kept to himself pulled from old Mrs. Hedley's purse, as if it had been a double tooth. "However, I suppose you had ought to do the Knapps credit," said the old lady, when her daughter stood before her dressed in all her splendor. "and you do look genteel." Milly nodded an assent, and hurried Milly jumped in. Off went the brown horse. Milly was enraptured. She felt that this was indeed style. What was the Knapps' wagon, drawn by white-eyelashed Dobbin, to this flight along the road, in such a turn-out, with such a driver?

"I always take toll at a bridge," said Mr. Fairer, as they rattled over one, and caught a kiss.

Milly had a vision of a brown-stone house, with high steps, in Fifth Avenue, on the instant. How much a commercial traveller's salary was, she did not know; but she fancied that one who dressed like a prince would live like

What would Adam Knapp think when she broke with him? She turned finger, under her glove. It was only plain gold plain gold.

On Mr. Fairer's little finger sparkled a diamond to match the one on his world, nor the prettiest."

The big apples, the bright peaches, the melons, the grapes made a great The music played, Squire Fisher made a speech, Judge Abbott followed. Prizes were awarded. Peoole ate ice cream and drank tea. There was a Punch and Judy show, a bird fortune-teller, and a swing that held six people, on the grounds; but big black clouds began to gather in the sky, and the sun hid his light before

Milly and her cavalier were eating ice cream in a bower built for the purpose and baptized the "Rosebud Dairy" when suddenly the small boy who held the horse came to Mr. Fairer's side and whispered to him. With an apology he started up and ran away, returning in a moment or so, very pale and with a queer frightened look in his

"'Tisn't very polite, Miss Milly," said he, "but I've got to leave you. You can get some of your friends to take you home, I suppose. You see my wife is here. I knew she was at mother's, but I never thought she'd come to the fair. She's got into my trap to give me a pleasant surprise, and I'm to drive her back. She's very jealous; a good deal older than me you know, and she's got all the money in the family. I've told her I was gentleman, thought Milly, and she talking to an old milliner woman about an order, so don't you show your pretty face. Old Dobbin was making his slow way home before the Knapps' wagon. Mrs. Knapp was proud and happy. Adam had received the prize for dwarf pears. The rain beat down, but the oil-cloth covering kept it off very well, and half their journey was over when, suddenly, Adam stopped with a jerk; his mother gave a cry.
