He was not one of those who said that expenditure did not increase with the growth of the country from year to year, but he believed it was their duty to watch and scrutinize well said that while the Tories of to-day had so much to say in eulogy of Baldwin and Lafontaine, he could recollect, though a lad at the time, that that party had given them very little help in their efforts. In fact the men who claimed to-day to be followers of the principles of these gentlemen, most violently opposed them in their struggle. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) He would ask the young Reformers present to look to those institutions under which they lived. What was it that endeared them in this day to the principle of con-
