Ellena's Engagement.

BY MARY E. MOFFAT. "Good-Morning, my boy; how goes the world with you to-day? I suppose you've heard the all-important news!" Lionel Herbert put out his hand and grasped the one extended by his old college chum, Reginald Montague, and gave it a warm welcoming pressure as he answered.

"The sun rises and sets about the same time as usual, I believe, and no thing out of the usual has occurred in my monotonous life since we last met A law student's routine is not the me exciting employment in the world. to the "news" you speak of, I haven't the slightest idea of what you refer to."

"Then you don't know that the pretty little girl you were so sweet upon at the Springs last summer is going to be married to old Lancaster's son--that fellow who we used to say must have been dipped in a dye of flax-water to make him, hair, eyes, and complexion, all of the same neutral color."

There was a sudden silence. Reginald turned and glanced at his friend. There was no mistaking the agitation which was written upon his face. He was vainly trying to school it to calm-

"Don't mind me, Lionel, we are old cronies, you know," he went on, hurriedly, wishing he had cut his togue out before making such a blunder. "I had no idea you were so hard hit in that direction, or I would have kept

"I had rather it had come from your lips than that of a stranger." Lionel managed to say; then he sank his head upon the mass of partially copied briefs, and did not again raise it until he had mastered himself. Then he said:

"You have seen my weakness, Regie, and I will make a clean breast of it to you. Then shall commence the strugstrength of my being. I look up to her as the one bright star in the firmament of Hope, although I have never breathed a syllable of love in her ear. Had I been a rich man it would have been very different. But I could not make an effort to win an heiress, while I had not even mastered my profession. Now I have lost all chance! the brightest jewel man ever coveted is to be sacrificed to Mammon-for I feel in my innermost heart that Ellena cannot love one so inferior as is Edmond Lancaster; but I must not say what I think of him as her future husband is entitled to at least respect at my hands."

"Lionel you have made a mistake," burst in Reginald, impulsively; "You should have tried your chance with Miss Faye. Because she is rich is no sign that she wants to marry for money." "I am no fortune-hunter, Regie My soul revolts at the thought.'

"Do you count your own talents as nothing? Tell the truth, man, don't you expect to make the future hear from you? I remember your ambition in the old college days, and I misjudge you much if it has abated one whit. tell you what is to pay with you, and what has spoiled your chance of happiness (as far as marriage with the girl you love is concerned), you are too

Just then the office boy came in with bulky looking documents, such as usually come to a law office, but one dainty circles; but it waves back from her face note lay upon the top of the pile. Lionel's face changed as he caught sight of it. He reached for it eagerly, and tore it open. It ran thus :-

"Will Mr. Herbert kindly confer a favor upon his friend. Ellena Faye, by calling upon her this evening at about 8 o'clock?"

Reginald was watching Lionel curiously as he read. But he asked no questions, and did not even say, as the spirit of mischief within him prompted, "Be off with the old love, before you are on with the new, old fellow." After a pause, his patience was re-

"Regie, what do you think ?- my note is from Ellena! I don't believe she's engaged. I feel like a new man. If it's a false report, I shall throw every scruple to the winds, and try and win her myself. Wish me success, Regie!"

"That I do, and heartily, too!" then, with a warm hand pressure the friends separated-Regie to make use of his brief holiday from business by calling upon his acquaintances, and Lionel to settle down for a day's hard work in the office; but Hope now unfurled her rainbow-hued wings in the heart which had been so heavy the moment before the arrival of that snow-white messenger, indited by the hand of her he loved.

It was evening. Within the spacious drawing-rooms of the Fayes' imposing city mansion all was light and glitter.

To a casual passer-by a look at those shining plate glass windows, festooned with draperies of lace as delicate as frost-work, and affording a glimpse of the priceless statues and exquisite paintings within-would have been like a glance at Paradise. "Surely the dwellers therein must be the happiest of mortals," would be the involuntary thought of the mind.

But no! riches and splendor do not woo happiness-that coy, illusive guest -to brood in one's heart!

Within a darkened boudoir a young girl has thrown herself upon her couch, and with her face buried amid its costly lace coverings, she cries as though her heart would break. She is the sole daughter of the owner of that magnificent dwelling. But that does not lighten her suffering.

-Suddenly she rises and goes to a richly inlaid writing desk which stands near the window. An exquisite bronze statuette of Morning rests upon it-one hand holding the traditional torch with which to illumine Phœbus upon his way. With a hasty gesture Ellena touches a tiny knob concealed in the base of the ornament, and a swift flame flies into the uplifted taper, Electricity is the magician that occasions this sudden metamorphosis of darkness into light.

"I will put him to the test," the girl murmurs, as she seats herself, and catching up a tiny pearl-handled pen. writes a few words rapidly, and folds and seals a brief note ready for the morrow's post. Then she leans back and thinks, and after a time smiles you would feel badly to have me martake the place of tears, for she has fall- ried to that man," said Ellena. take the place of tears, for she has fallen asleep and is dreaming that all that
