in England. Except that the ties were lost the Premier's whole statement is false. Girouard had contracted to deliver the ties at Petit Rocher, and could not in any case be entitled to damages for loss by the way. Stevenson was a paymaster, and not in a position to give orders concerning delivery of material. It was not in his power to pledge the government in any way. He denies that he gave orders, or made a promise on behalf of the Government, or did anything except pay Girouard, who expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the settlement. Duplessis, who was present at the time, says that Girouard was contented. As a reason for discrediting the officials in favor of the claimant Sir John said :-"The truth was that Stevenson had given the authority for sending the rafts to Petit Rocher, but finding afterwards that he was getting into a scrape, and was liable to be discharged, tried to get out of the difficulty by denying that he had given the authority.'
