Precautions are now taken that there shall be no mistake when a man is to be knighted; as on one occasion, during the reign of William IV., two individuals ' received the honor without authority." They attended a levee, and handed in the usual cards on entering the presence chamber, with "to receive the honor of knighthood" below the names. It was taken for granted that all were correct, so they were down on their knees and up again in a trice, and it was not till the evening that it occurred to the Lord Chamberlain to send enquiries to the Home Office respecting the two new knights .-Whereupon it turned out that the whole thing was a hoax, but one of serious importance, inasmuch as the jokers having ouce been knighted could not be unknighted. Since this episode a new knight has

We passed a spot where some nobleman's grounds were being appropriated for a public park; it was only lately that people had been allowed to cross them, and all was in the rough, preparations for the change having been begun. Part of the turf had been torn up for a roadway, but there was a little emerald strip where three or four ragged children, the eldest not over ten, were turning somersaults in great delight. As we approached, they paused and looked shyly at us, as if uncertain of their right on these premises; and I could see the oldest, a sharp-eyed little London boy, reviewing us with one keen glance, as if selecting him in whom confidence might best be placed. Now I am myself a child-loving person; to a half-carbonized state and reduced and I had seen with pleasure Mr. Froude's kindly ways with his own youthful household; yet the little gamin dismissed us with a glance and fastened on Carlyle. Pausing on one foot, as if ready to take to his heels on the least discoagement, he called out the daring question, "I say mister, may we roll on this here grass!" The philosopher faced round, leaning on his staff, and replied in a homelier Scotch fashion than I had yet heard him use, "Yes, my little fellow, r r-roll at discraytion!" Instantly the children resumed their antics, while one little girl repeated. meditatively, "He says we may roll at discraytion !"-as if it were some new kind of nine-pin ball .- T. W. Higginson

The Modern Uses of Steel. At present there is but one sound reason why steel should not universally replace iron with advantage, and that is, that in some cases it is cheaper to employ iron. Statistics shows us that the enormous quantities of steel now manufactured have but little, if at all, affected the production of wrought-iron. It is, however, I am convinced, but a question of time. When the day comes-and every day brings us nearer to it -when steel will be manufactured as cheaply as iron, then will wrought iron be a thing of the past among the great civilized nations. One word as regards the employment of steel made by these modern methods for cutlery. Cutlery manufacturers would siderable extent. I do not hesitate to assert that, with suitable ores and proper care in the manufacture, steel well suited for cutlery can be made both in the openhearth and the converter. The essential in the ore is that it should not contain phosphorus; with but a trace of phosphorus present, a good cutting edge could never If we glance back for a moment to review our history, we shall see that the openhearth processes embody the same principle as the first process by which steel was produced, viz., the mutual action of carburized iron and oxid of iron on one another, and the Bessemer process is, after all, though a splendid offspring, only the natural descendant of the finery process, the origin of which, as we have seen, was due to modifications in the primitive blast-furnaces. There is perfect continuity throughout, and, after all, what more natural ?- Professor A.K. Huntington, in Popular Science
