The January ssue, referring to ralway monopoly, says "Without the free construction of railways the development of the country is impersible, and some in not at once, the fifthers, will surely be burst. As soon as he Grand Trunk, through its western onnections, or any other line deminded commerce, comes in sight on the southein frontier, where the boundary is merely conventi nal, a rail will be run out to it, and the attempt to cut off Ma itoba econmically from the region with which she is by nature i lentified, in deference to a political theory, will end as everybody who studies, not the balance of parties but the action of the great forces, must from the outset have been sure that it would end. Does not the whole of this history show how difficult it is even for the best and most liberal of mother coun tries to manage wisely the affair of people three or four thousand miles off ? Had nature been allowed to take her own course, the North West would have been settled quietly, an i in a heal by way ; the land would have gone to the settler, the price, which would have been measured by the expense of organization, to the State ; the railroads would have been laid out on the lines which commerce required; there would have been no monopoly clauses or monopoly of any kind."
