A European observer, M. de Merejowsky, has lately studied certain of the lower crustaceans with a view of deciding whether or not those creatures are able to distinguish colors. As a result of his experiments, he has concluded that while the crustaceans are fully alive to the difference between light and darkness, it is solely the quantity and not the quality which affects them, for they two rays of equal intensity, whatever may be the colors. There appears to be, then, a wide difference between the lower crustaceans and man, in the perception of light. While we see different colors and their different intensities. the crustaceans see only one color with variations of intensity. We perceive

Adaptation, also, must have exerted an influence in causing the bony armor of the brain to become thickened to serve as a protection for that delicate organ. With civilized man a change is found. Natural selection no longer has special occasion to remove persons of weak crania, as the less exposed to violence than at any former period in the world's history, but in view of the fact that the most advanced races of to-day were barbarians a few centuries ago, it is obviously too early to look for any great change.
