

Carrying off the Prize.

"Nobody goes to church on Easter day without an entirely new suit in the very latest fashion!" said Mrs. De Novelles.

"Certainly not!" said Alice, her eldest daughter. "Mrs. Pelham has written to Paris for a new bonnet to my certain knowledge."

"And, of course," added Emily, the youngest scion of the house of De Novelles, "as you are spending the winter with us, Madeline, you will be expected not to disgrace us."

Madeline Moray looked from one to the other of the speakers with a troubled expression of countenance.

"But, Aunt De Novelles," said she, "mamma writes me that our old Cousin Zephaniah and his wife have come from Maine, very poor, and that we must economize as much as possible in order to keep them off the town. They are very old, and need a great many little luxuries, and—"

Mrs. De Novelles' face darkened visibly.

"Madeline," said she, "will you never forget that you belong to a farmer's family down east? Your Cousin Zephaniah is nothing to me. Of course, while you are my guest, I shall expect you to dress as becomes your station as my niece."

Madeline knitted her pretty brows in sore perplexity after Aunt De Novelles had rustled out, leaving a strong odor of patchouli behind her. She had admired the devotion of her aunt and the girls in attending the church services so regularly during Lent; she, too, had sat in the dim, religious light of the perfumed church, trying to recall her wandering thoughts to the words which she uttered, and had come to the conclusion that she was not half so good as her aunt, and Emily, and Alicia. And now, Aunt De Novelles felt no charity for poor old Cousin Zephaniah, and wanted her to spend all her little money for dress and fashion to make an outside show.

She had a fifty-dollar bill yet left of the small store which they had scraped together at home when they sent her to spend a winter in Boston with Aunt De Novelles, and she took it from her purse and smoothed it out upon her desk. Fifty dollars! She hoped to save it all for Cousin Zephaniah.

Her pretty silk, with the damask front, was very fresh and pretty still—she had only worn it some half-dozen times—and her neat little split-straw hat would look very nice, if she bought a new ribbon for it and rearranged the flowers. At least that was the mental conclusion at which she had arrived, when Mrs. De Novelles issued her commands, binding as an imperial ukase, that a new Easter suit was among the necessities.

Madeline knew very well that she was pretty. She never looked into the glass without perceiving the difference between her fresh apple-blossom of a face, and the enameled and rouged complexions of her city cousins. She knew that her long hair was like burnished coils of gold, her long-lashed eyes like stars; and she would have liked a new Easter suit as well as any one—and the bonnets in Madame Pringle's window looked infinitely beautiful in her eyes, with their French roses and perfectly simulated violets; but there was the old man and his enfeebled wife to remember—the ancient relics of a bygone generation who had outlived the sympathy of almost all the world.

"No," said Madeline to herself, "I must not spend this money, Easter suit or no Easter suit."

So she sat herself down in the rainy March afternoon to rip up the shot silk dress and alter it so that even Alicia and Emily should not know it for the same.

But with all her skill in amateur dressmaking the folds would not hang stylishly, the old creases would obtrude themselves on the eye, and the costume proclaimed in its every glisten and puff, "Made over, made over, made over!"

Emily De Novelles shook her head. "Madeline," said she, "it's of no use. You never can wear that dress! And your hat too. A plain split straw, without so much as a French flower."

Madeline burst into tears.

"Very well, Emily," she said. "Then I will remain at home. You need not fear that I will disgrace the congregation of St. Etheldreda on Easter Sunday."

And this pledge evidently relieved the mind of Miss De Novelles.

"For" as she afterward told her sister Alicia, "these half-civilized country girls are capable of anything."

And the two elegant sisters did not take the trouble, when Captain Brabant dropped in to 5 o'clock tea, to send up word to Madeline, that there was company in the parlor.

"I suppose she don't care to see me!" the captain thought, with a sinking heart, when at last he went away after having lingered as long as politeness would admit.

"I suppose he never asked for me!" Madeline said to herself, as, from her window, she saw his retreating figure saunter slowly down the street. "Well, it matters less than ever now about the Easter suit. Nobody will know whether I have one or not."

But when Easter eve came, and Madeline was crying softly in her own room, to think of the radiant spring sunset that was flooding all the world at home, the colored water came grinning up to the door.

"Please, Miss Maddy," he said, "hurry a basket of laylocks. Real springy-mellin', I do declare! Wid de cappen's card—Capten Brabant, miss!"

Madeline uttered an exclamation of delight.

Oh, the lovely, purple things! Clusters of lilac fragrance! Delicious reminders of the springtime at home. Oh, how kind it was of Captain Brabant to remember that she was a country girl exiled here among brick walls!

Madeline Cresson's young woman sat up until 12 o'clock that night to finish the three elegant costumes which Mrs. DeNovelles and her daughters had ordered. The three bonnets did not come home until Sunday morning.

But Madeline watched them sail forth to church, to the glitter of golden sunbeams and the clanging of melodious bells, like three fashion platers.

And then she put on her plain little "made-over dress," and, taking a fresh cluster of lilacs from the vase of water, pinned it across the split-straw hat.

"There!" she thought, as she tied the strings under her chin, "no Paris exotic ever looked half so sweet as that! And I am sure that heaven will incline its ear no less favorably to my prayers than if I went to St. Etheldreda's in Worth's newest design."

And she crept into the little church in the adjoining street, which had long gone out of fashion, and where the spectacled old clergyman practiced all the austerities or the early fathers through dire necessity.

She sat there listening to the anthems and thinking of the dear ones at home, and wondering of Cousin Zephaniah and his poor old purling wife would ever know that she (little Madeline Moray) had cast her mite to relieve their sore necessities, and recalling vaguely the poor widow whose offering had once been so precious in the holiest of eyes. Hers was not much now, but she also had given it from a free and willing heart.

As she moved quietly and with reverent, downcast eyes out of the church, some one stepped to her side.

"You have dropped something, Miss Moray," said Captain Brabant.

And he held up the cluster of lilacs, drooping now, and little faded.

She put her hand up to her bonnet, with a scarlet blush.

"Your lilacs, Captain Brabant!" she said.

His face brightened.

"I am proud that you deemed them worthy of wearing," said he. "Your cousin told me that you did not care for flowers or books or society—that you were not even going to church on Easter day."

"I cried Madeline. 'Oh Captain Brabant, I like all three! I cried over your flowers when they came last night. They seemed to me like dear friends from home. And I wore them in my bonnet because—I could not afford artificial blossoms. There! now you know how poor I am!'"

And she laughed even while the roseate tinge suffused her cheek.

"I do not know whether you are poor or not," said he; "but I do know that I think you are the nearest perfection of any girl whom I ever saw!"

"May I tell you all about it?" she asked hurriedly. "For I do not want you to think me an avaricious semi-barbarian, as my cousins sometimes pronounce me. And then you shall tell me whether you think I am right or wrong."

They walked slowly home from church in the soft, bland sunlight of that Easter day, and when they reached the brown stone mansion on Silverstone street, Captain Brabant went in and formally asked Mrs. DeNovelles' permission to address her niece with a view to marriage.

That was Madeline Moray's Easter gift. A man's true and loyal heart—the dawn of a great happiness over a life which, up to this hour, had been but chill and solitary.

There was no denying that Mrs. De Novelles was much disappointed. Emily and Alicia had been in society three seasons now without having received any eligible offer; and it did seem strange that this pale, quiet little girl from the backwoods, as Mrs. De Novelles contemptuously expressed it, should have carried off such a glittering prize as Captain Brabant—for it never occurred to them that Madeline's sweet unselfishness and quiet self-denial could possibly have anything to do with the matter.

And as old Cousin Zephaniah and his wife lived, Captain Brabant made them an annual allowance, which was ample for their simple wants.

The expenditure of brain power too early or too severely in children often results in physical debility; the use of Fellows' Hypophosphites exerts a singularly happy effect in such cases.
