I cannot speak of that night yet with calmens. With mother and the doctor I saw him die. The death-bed scene was burned into my brain; and it will inever be effaced; the horrible cries he uttered and his imploring screams to us for help which we could not give, are still ringing in my cars.

The doctor labored very hard, but the medicine had no effect; the worntout stomach rejected everything at last, and it was impossible to get him to sleep. Towards morning the delirium passed away, and then he was oh, so weak! But he knew us, cried like a child for his wasted life, begged our forgiveness many times, and then with his arm around mother's neck and my hand clasped in his, he sank to sleep like a little child.

After the funeral we were very poor. Father had earned but little for several ayears, and the steady drain upon his once comfortable property had lold seriously. We had nothing left. There were only mother and I, and I said baravely, Mother, I will work; you shall not suffer.
