THE GAMBLER'S STORY.

I met him by accident in a railway station. The train was late and he and I were the only occupants of the dingy little waiting room. Under these circumstances folks are drawn toward each other by the magnetism of mutual discomfort, and we fell to talking. He was a fine-looking fellow, tall, well built and vigorous, but an air of indescribable melancholy permeated his appearance and tinged even his talk to such an extent that our conversation languished and would probably have died entirely had he not finally turned around and said to me:

"You must excuse me, sir, for an apparent moodiness. The truth is that I am unable to shake off the recollection that to-night is the anniversary of a sad and singular event in my life. I was a professional gambler in my younger days and dealt faro for a living, but ten years ago to-night I quit forever under circumstances that even now half unman me and almost call the tears to my eyes. I have no objection to telling you the story if you think that it would interest you."

I begged him to go on and he proceeded about as follows:

"Ten years ago," he said, "I was the proprietor of club rooms at Baltimore, where I dealt a game of faro for a select circle of players. They were all heavy betters, business men most of them, and I catered to their game only. My rooms were sumptuously fitted up. There was no appointment that gilded vice could suggest that was not at hand, and my sideboard groaned with the choicest vintages that money could buy.

"One night when the game was slack and I was lounging in the dealer's chair under the great crimson globe of the chandelier, a stranger entered the room. He was very young, but dissipation or care had drawn lines upon his boyish face, and his dark eyes burned with a feverish light. As he approached the table I marked how ghastly pale he was and that his hand trembled as though with a chill. He took a seat and drawing a thousand dollar bill from his pocket, tossed it across the table. 'Give me that much in chips,' he said in a tremulous voice.

"I think he must have played for an hour. Luck went back and forth for a while, but finally it set in against him and I raked in the last of his ivories. For a moment he sat motionless, staring, dazed-like, at the floor, then he lifted up his haggard face to mine. 'Sir,' he said, 'you have, without knowing it, done me a favor. Had I won, I would have kept on in the old way; now that I have lost, I will never gamble again.' I smiled cynically. 'Yes, I said, 'I have heard people talk that way before.' 'You mistake me,' he went on in a voice that thrilled my very heart. 'I will not gamble again because the last card you turned was my death warrant. Listen to me. That thousand dollars I have lost was the last of fortune, home and honor. It is gone, all gone to enrich your clan. I am not blaming you; I am not complaining; I am simply stating a fact. I am to-night the worst of paupers—one without trade, without a profession, without the ability to support the wife who is this moment confidently and trustingly awaiting my return. She knows nothing of my gradual downfall. I have dissimulated, God knows how, before her. I have not now one dollar upon the face of the earth, and I determined when I entered your door that if it came to this, if my last stake lost, I would this night terminate the failures and follies of my life. I am in earnest. Something impelled me to tell you this, and these will probably be my last words," he said with a look of pain.

"I arose, deeply moved, and pulling open the drawer took out the thousand dollar bill. 'Here my friend,' I said, 'Take back this money and begin life over again. It will keep you until you can find employment. Go home and confess everything to your wife, be a man and keep out of gambling hells forever."

"He started violently, turned crimson, and for an instant choked up in his throat. 'Generous man,' he said finally, 'I cannot, and will not accept this money. It is yours, you won it fairly, but if you will give me half of it, I will follow your advice. You may not realize it, sir, but you have to-night snatched a soul from the brink of eternity.

"I counted him out $500, and with tears streaming from his eyes he left the house."

"And from that time you quit gambling?" I exclaimed, strangely impressed by the narrative.

"No, not exactly from that time;" replied the stranger choking a sob, 'It was from about an hour later, when I found out that the thousand dollar bill was counterfeit and I had been worked for the $500."

I walked out into the still, solemn night and waited for the train alone.—Unidentified.
