There's nothing for useless creatures like me but matrimony. Ah, Lottie, darling, if I only had your capable ways, your strength of mind, how much luckier I would be! By which eveyone understood that Cecile intended to marry the first rich man whom she could capture! Louis Stanbury was rich; he was also tall and handsome, and Lottie told herself, when she got Cecile's note say-Tuesday, 'unless you telegraph me that it is inconvenient for me to come so soon,' that no girl could help admiring him extravagantly. But as he had several times said that he did not admire blondes (his own eyes were blue, but dark blue, and his hair a light golden brown,) she thought that per-haps Cecile would not attract him to

Cecile had now been with Lottie a week; the first few days all went well, comfortable, but as she and Louis were not betrothed, she could not interfere when Cecile had rather usurped his time aud attentions.

Certainly Cecile did look pretty in that white serge dress! But what were she and Louis talking so earnestly about, Lottie wondered, and why did Louis avoid her glance when she joined them on the shore! She soon learned.

'Lottie, darling, Mr. Stanbury is talking of taking me out for a little row; you don't mind, do you? You see I have never met the Dennison girls, aud he says he doesn't care particularly about either of them, so we planned to run away for an hour. You don't mind, do you? asked Cecile 1ather plaintively. 'Why should I mind?' answered

'Only because we can't take you too; I suppose you are quite too proper to run off and leave your expected guests or will you go with us?'

'You know I can't go, Cecile. But you need not let that keep you at home

Is your arm better Mr. Stanbury?' 'What ails his arm?' asked Cecile. But though her words were light her heart was not, and the next two hours went slowly by; meantime the weather changed, a strong east wind sprang up, and the fog was closing in quite quickly when the two truants returned. 'Did you have a pleasant time?' Mrs Reynolds asked Cecile politely as she came up on the piazza where the family were sitting.

'Oh, it was too lovely for anything!' 'How quick the wind sprang up though!' exclaimed Louis. There's a dense fog outside. My moustache actually tastes salt,' added he, turning to

'Yes, I know it does,' replied she artlessly. Dead silence for just about five seconds, during which time the Dennison girls exchanged glances; Lottie looked up quickly at Louis Stanbury, whose face turned scarlet, and Miss Reynolds
