'LITTLE PRIMROSE.'

'Could anything be more provoking?' cried Miss Annie Villion, as she impatiently tossed aside a letter she had just perused. 'Uncle Barn is actually coming here for a long visit. He is quite an invalid, lately, it seems, and I daresay he chooses to come at the time of our vacation, because he will require a great deal of attention.'

'O, our grand plan for a month in the mountains must be deferred until another summer,' Miss Rose returned quite cheerfully.

'You can do as you like,' said the elder sister, 'but I shall make no change in my arrangements for the gratification of a selfish and ugly old man.'

'But Uncle Barn was always so fond of you, Annie,' was the gentle remonstrance.

'His fondness for me has never made my life any easier,' Miss Villion answered, contemptuously, 'it has never saved me from drudgery in a sales-room, nor from dullness and poverty at home.'

Rose sighed.

Their home indeed was not as pleasant as might have been desirable. The low wooden house, built on a scrap of unwholesome ground, with a stretch of rocky common on every side, was far out in the bleak and unsightly limits of the city. The least unbeautiful thing in the surroundings was a gaunt and sickly aspen that grew beside the modest entrance. But within, the small rooms were sufficiently cheerful, with bright carpeting, tastefully hung walls, neat furniture and simple adornments.

'If our home is dull, it is still our own,' observed the less discontented Rose. 'And our poverty it rather nominal, I should say, so long as we are never ill and never unemployed. And besides, as Uncle Barn is quite as poor as we ourselves are, we have no right to expect help from him.'

'Really, you are as precise in your arguments as you are in everything else,' Annie laughed, scornfully, and with irritation, 'you merit your nick-name, for you are verily a Prim Rose. You have no more ambition than the colorless flower in the pot beside you. And you are entirely content, I suppose, to relinquish your proposed pleasure, and remain at home to oblige and entertain our disagreeable old Uncle.'

'I certainly shall not disappoint or disoblige the only relative we have, and one who has always been most kind to us both,' Primrose declared, stoutly.

'Well, I shall go,' Annie iterated, with determination, 'There is nothing gained by obliging a poor and inconsiderate relation. And besides, the trip will afford me such splendid opportunities. Were you aware that Mr. Wilson has proposed to join the party?'

'Our employer,' murmured Primrose, bending low her pretty head over the dainty white blossoms, from which Mr. Wilson, himself, had given her that fanciful and fitting name. Annie did not note the swift blushes of the face hidden by the primrose flowers.

'I am sure, Rose,' she continued, in a manner that had become abrupt, confidential, 'I am very sure that something more than a summering in the mountains attracts Mr. Wilson. I have noticed that he seems more than necessarily concerned about our comfort, and of course, he cannot care for you, Rose—you are too plain, and prim and reserved. I fancy, however, that I am handsome enough and clever enough to secure him. And you need not be surprised, little Primrose, if I soon wear an engagement diamond—and that the rarest that his money can buy.' She was much too engrossed by the brilliant anticipation of the conquest she had planned to make, to heed the sudden look of pain that came upon the fair patient face of her younger sister.

A few days later she departed, and shortly afterwards Uncle Barn arrived. He was an agreeable old gentleman, small of statue with a grand head, covered with thick, frosty hair. He had keen thoughtful eyes that could twinkle with sky sarcasm, or soften the kindest smiles, and his voice and manner were grave and pleasing. He seemed neither astonished or troubled by the dereliction of his favorite niece.

'I, no doubt, somewhat exaggerated my little illness, he remarked, and of course, Annie would not sacrifice her pleasure to nurse a sick old man.'

'Annie will be very glad to learn that you are quite well,' said little Primrose, nobly apologetic for the ungracious sister whose faults she deplored, 'her work is hard and her life dull, and she really needed a little change nd rest. And, besides, she could scarcely have remained without displeasing the friends who invited her to be one of their party.'

'But you have remained cheerfully enough,' was the ready comment. Are variety and leisure never necessary to you? Have you no friends, whose disappointment you fear?'

Primrose blushed, while a suspicion of tears dimmed the brightness of her arge gray eyes. Her heart was away in the mountains, where one might be—one tender friend, whose possible disappointment made her sorely uneasy.

'But it is different with me,' she protested bravely, 'I am more of a home-body than Annie is, and besides'—she paused, reluctant to utter what might imply a selfishness of her sister.

'And besides what!' he inquired.

'I always prefer to please most the friends who have been kindest to me,' she finished unwillingly.

For a moment Uncle Barn silently and earnestly regarded the girl, who looked marvelously sweet and pretty, in her soft white dress, with white primroses in her smooth hair, she is fair as her own flower, he thought admiringly, she is truthful, just and al-womanly. 'Little Primrose, he said aloud to her, the purpose of my life has been to benefit, in some way the chill dren of my dead brother. The ability to do all I wished has been witheld from me until very recently. But at last I am possessed of quite a respectable competence—something like a hundred thousand dollars, I believe,' he announced with a waggish glance at the wondering countenance of the girl; and I propose to retire from speculation, and establish for myself a home—that you will understand must have a mistress. And as you are the home-body, I offer you the situation.'

'But Uncle Barn my sister is much more'—she began, but he interrupted her by an expressive gesture.

'My dear,' he said affectionately and with authority, 'you are elected to be my daughter and heiress. Annie is your sister and my niece, she will have precisely what she deserves, that and nothing more.' And gently kissing her lovely white forehead, he strolled out out of the house.

As she stood there, half bewildered, in the centre of the tiny parlor, some one tapped lightly upon the open door, and glancing up, she beheld Mr. Wilson. He advanced towards her with a look on his fine, eager face that brought the warm red blushes swiftly to her pretty cheeks and a new splendor to her large, soft eyes.

'I thought you had gone, she faltered,' while he still held her delicate shy hand. "I thought you were with Annie and the rest of them.'

'When I learned that you were not going, I choose to stay in the city, where I could still be near you,' he answered, meaningly, 'I have missed you grievously these days, Little Primrose, the store seems another place without you.'

'You wish me to come back, perhaps,' said Rose.

'To the store? Never!' he asserted with passionate tenderness. 'I want you to come to me as my best beloved and my most honored—as my wife.'

The glad surprise of that one brief hour had quite unnerved the gentle, long-enduring little heart, and she could only lean her pretty head against her lover's arm and weep tears of divinest joy that all had at last gone well with her and hers.

Some time afterward Miss Annie Villion was summoned back from the mountains, where she had not been particularly happy. She was wanted to assist at the marriage of her employer, Mr. Wilson with Uncle Barns' heiress, Little Primrose.

SAMPLE ROOMS.
For Commercial Men

THE demand for Sample Rooms to accommodate for the commercial travellers being so great, and the supply being inadequate, causing the travellers in some instance to remain three or four days awaiting their turn has induced the subscriber to build two Sample Rooms, well lighted, aired and warm. Commercialmen can depend on obtaining just what they require, being situated in the central part of the business community, namely, corner Main and Wesley Streets, they will be found to be far more suitable, comfortable and convenient. Should a horse and sleigh be required it will be furnished without additional expense. Rooms secured either by letter or telegram.
