

ROMANCE OF A GLOVE.

I have seen many fellows "doing their spous," but Bill Harker against the world—"bar none"—for going the extreme pace. It would have mattered little if Bill could have kept his courtship to himself; he might have worshipped in secret all his days, and no one have been any the wiser.

name. Whose should it be but hers—Foussi! That, coupled with the half legible F on the blotting-pad, he accepted as conclusive, poor fellow, little dreaming in how many other gloves he could have found the same name. So now then he could write to her. And write he did, that same evening, at Camden Town, a manly though passionate letter, detailing his love, his trials, his hopes, and last, if not so fully his position.
