THE FROZEN DUDE

A SAMPLE FROM THE DAILY EXPERIENC OF REPORTERS. I will not mention the real name of the reporter to whom this adventure occurred because he still lives, and though he is now an Episcopal clergyman in a neighboring city, I am afraid he might be inclined to put aside any religious scruples he may have concerning assault and battery, and get himself into a police court if I give him away to his congregation by indentifying him. Any name will do for him, but I will call him Billy, which was his first name anyway. If any of his congregation recognize him by that fraction of his congnomen I do not hold myself responsible.

Billy was known to all the newspaper reporters as The Frozen Dude before he had heen in the business a week. He first conferred himself upon the Sun from Harvard, and there was a sensation when he made his debut in the report. ers' room. I have never in my life seen a person of such absolute imperturbability of countenance, and very few of such lofty demeanor, as the same Billy. His features might have been frozen actually for all the expression there was in them, and in spite of the fact that he was laughed at and guied in half of the places he went into on account of his appearance, I never knew him to lose his absolute composure that was his chief characteristic. I have seen him in all kirds of situations, too, from dancing in a Bowery free and easy or sitting in the wing in the sight of the audience at a variety show, to taking notes of a sermon on the pulpit steps in Plymouth church, and attempting to convince the chairman of the Ladies' National Temperance Association, at the big meeting in Chickering Hall, that alcoholic liquors had their estimable qualities.

When Billy first reported for duty at the desk of the city editor of the Sun, Aw, Mr. Bogart, I think it might be well before we go any further, that you should understand that I have a distinct preference for literary work.

Very well, responded Bogart, you will confine your literature to the south side station for the next month.

He did, too, the south side station being the assignment that the New York reporters generally begin upon. But the boys in the Sun office and in the Press Club room found that Billy was not by any means a fool, as they had first thought him, but, on the contrary, a particularly keen and intelligent youth. I have described him at length because the story is not half as good i one has not some idea of the kind of fellow Billy was.

The Frozen Dude made his debut in journalism six or eight years ago, at time when the business of bunco steer ing was at its height, and he used to often lament that the bunca men never tried to pick him up, since he thought the experience would be an interesting one to write about. One day, after he had been in the Sun office about : month, there was a fire reported up in the middle of the city somewhere, and Billy was given a fire badge that admitted him within the fire lines, and sent up to see what was the matter. The fire badges then was almost exactly like the police and detective badges except that they bore the name of the newspaper instead of members. Two or three years ago they were changed for big tin badges about the size of a dinner plate, that the reporters now wear. Being a new reporter, Billy proudly fastened the fire badge over his manly bosom upon his waist-coat, and buttoned up his coat-he always dressed in the top of the fashion-he set forth. The fire did not amount to much, and on his way back, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, the Frozen Dude went into the Fifth Ayenue Hotel for a quencher, and then came out and leaned against one of the pillars. I suppose he looked like some young swell from out of town, who was lonesome in the great city and would be very much pleased to find an old acquaintance to show him the sights. At any rate Billy had not stood there more than five minutes when he was saluted with the words:

What, old ! man you down here! Wny didn't you let us know you were coming?

At the same time his hand was grasped and shaken vigorously. The greeting was so cordial and the ring of the voice so honest that Billy hardly thought of the bunco men at first, and turning his expressionless countenance upon the young man, who was gotten up regardless of expense, he said:

Aw, pardon. You have the advantage of me.

Billy says that he never saw a man so embarrassed before in his life, and that he blushed so violently as to cast a crimson glow upon the white pillars of the hotel.

I beg a thousand pardons, he stammered, but it is a most extraordinary resemblance. Why, even now I could almost swear that you are my old friend Hamilton, of Chicago, at Princetown.

The stranger's embarrassment might have imposed upon Billy, but that a and, to satisfy his conscience, threw the gentleman who had made a mistake of dice for it, and won it by himself. that nature would have passed on after an apology, with no further words. Delightedly he led the bunco man on.

I can't say that the resemblance to your friend Hamilton is very flattering bitter thoughts concerning the Frozen to him, he said with rustic garrulity, Dude. but I'm a very different man. My name is Orton and I am from Cleve-

That' singular, too, said the other, affecting more embarrassment than ever, I'm sure you will excuse my asking the question, but it is Henry Orton? My sister met a young gentleman of that name in Cleveland last snmmer and she's been talking about him ever since. It is impossible that you are Henry Or. Under the circumstances, returned the Frozen Dude in his best manner, I'm very sorry to be obliged to admit that I am not Henry Orton. My name is Isaac Orton.

The young man begged pardon some more and blushed a great deal, and was lost in the crowd on Broadway.

Billy knew that the next move in the game would be for the bunco man's pal to come and address him by the name he had given the other, and he said that his heart bounded with exultation and Particulars free. GRAY & CO., St John, N.-R he began to frame in his mind the manner in which he would write his story about them. But he waited fully a quarter of an hour, and as no one spoke to him he began to fear that his new acquaintance was not a crook after all, and walked away. He had not reached the corner of Twenty-third street, however, when a middle-aged man of medium stature, with iron gray hair, suddenly turned out of the swarm in the middle of the sidewalk after half passing him, and seized his hand.

I declare, he said in measured, but cordial tones, if this isn't little Ikey Orton grown up to be a man! When did you come down, and how are all the good people of the prettiest city on the lakes?

Billy's mobility of features stood him in good stead this time, for he had to swallow hard to keep himself from

Don't know me, I'll wager? cried the second bunco gentleman, merrily before Billy had a chance to speak, but still shaking his hand. Well, perhaps it's no wonder. I came to New York a long while ago to make my fortune : and, by Jove, I've made it too. New York's the place after all. But I haven't told you yet that I am Douglas Peabody, a nephew of the President of the Stock Yard bank, guess you'll remember me now. Why, yes, certainly, said Billy vaguely as if he felt he ought to know Mr. Douglas Peabody but didn't quite re-

Well, I'm delighted to see you down here, said Mr. Peabody. I was just on my way to Delmonico's to luncheon ; won't you come and have a chop and a pint of Chablish with me? Do, I insist.

The Frozen Dude accepted the invitation, but the bunco man was too fly to go to Delmonico's where a detective is always on watch at the door. He walked up to the corner of Twenty-sixth street on the opposite side of Broadway, one halfsof the two Bond Church Street, adjoining however, and then stopping suddenly,

Ah my boy, I'm going to take you to a place where they serve the Gaintiest luncheon in New York. Beats Del's all hollow. And he led the way to an Italian cafe in Twenty-eight street. Here they had a luncheon with two kinds of wine costing the gentlemanly crook a little more than $12. While they were sipping their black coffee Mr. Peabody remarked:

By the way, I've just won a valuable oil painting in a lottery and I was going down to Fourteenth street to have it sent up this afternoon. Shall we take The subscriber offers for sale his four acre field on the Station Road in the Town of Chatham. adjoining "Blink Bonnie" property, known as a cab down? Perhaps you'd like to look at it, if you've nothing better to do. Billy didn't care if he did, and a in few moments they were bowling down Broadway. I don't imagine that bunco men lavish as much expense upon every victim they pick up, but the appearance of the Frozen Dude was imposing, and the conversation concerning his wealth and expectations had not lowered him in the estimation of his new friend; Billy says that he actually caught. term their prev. The cab stopped at a big house between Seventh and Eighth avenues, and Billy followed Mr. Douglas Peabody into a back room. There were three men in the room. One sat at a small desk, The Property formerly owned and eccupied by and made a pretence of counting a big roll of bills, and a third sat in a chair Late outside of the railing with his hat on. Mr. Peabody was congratulated upon his luck in winning so valuable an oil painting, and then, being informed that there was to be drawing in another lot- For particulars apply to tery, he gave a check for $500 for 10 tickets, and finally decided to shake dice with the man behind the desk for $10 a point. Billy was asked to go in, and as he figured that they would allow him to win the first time, he did so. The other man outside the railing also put down $10, and the man at the desk smoothed out the four bills and put a paper weight

The Frozen Dade unbuttoned his in order to appear at his ease, and then the strangest transformation scene he says he ever witnessed occurred. It was like a play, he said, when doors are arranged for the simultaneous disappearance of all the actors. The man behind the desk looked up at him, his eyes suddenly stuck out, his hair rose and in the twinkling of an eye he had tipped the desk over and gone through a side door. Billy at the same instant heard a crash in another direction and looked toward, the rear window just in time to see the man who had been counting bills at the big desk break through the closed blinds into the back yard; and when he turned to lock for Mr. Douglas Peabody and the other man, the outside door was just slamming at their heels. It was like the disappearance of Roderick

Dhu's clan before Fitz James. Billy was utterly bewildered until he CHARLES happened to glance at his waistcoat and caught sight of his fire badge. Then he knew that the bunco men had taken him for a detective, hence their flight. Billy picked up the $40 from the floor apply to
