

TESTED.

She had been the belle of Wildhaven since she came from a boarding school in Philadelphia to reside over her father's house with pretty airs of control which Mrs. Wells, the annual housekeeper, never resented or contradicted.

and her father called her little vanity, with a quivering smile, when she asked for them.

Even when Mark came, as he did several times, Mrs. Wells dressed her, tried on her lace cap that covered her poor bald head, and said sick folks never expected to drink.

But one day, when she felt nearly well, she took down the sitting room, alone and looked full in the mirror over the mantle-piece.

She knew then why she had been so tenderly guarded from the shock of seeing her own face. A border of fluted lace replaced her splendid hair, and a uniform deep pink color was spread like a mask over her whole face.

Her eyes were sunken, and a strange, unnatural ugliness seemed to have usurped her own beauty. Covering her face, she wept bitter, unavailing tears.

She had been innocently proud of her lovely face, and Mark had loved it. Even in her first grief she thought most of her lover, sobbing his name till, as if in answer, he bent over her.

May, he said, do not grieve so. It is only your beauty that is gone. The best of you is here, little May.

She looked up, saying: You had better call me Mary Jane now, in answer to her name.

I want to call you Mrs. Pendleton as soon as possible, he replied gayly.

Mark you would not marry such a fright!

Just try me! Why, May, he added gravely you surely do not imagine this change in your face shakes my love. Suppose this fever had come after we were married, do you suppose I should have run away?

You had better have been forced to submit to it, I suppose, she said, very dubitantly. Now you can escape.

Think! I am very well content in my present bondage, I assure you.

He had no objection to her arguing an immediate wedding. The doctor smiled when May made some wondering comments, saying: I should be sorry to think Mark loved only your beauty, my daughter.

And the old man indulged in a most unusual chuckle, as if immensely amused by some thought of his own.

But the wedding was once more postponed by Mark himself.

His brother in New Orleans died suddenly, and his widow needed some one to look after the property. So the winter glided away, and April opened, when a dispatch announced Mark's speedy return, and preparations for the wedding were hastened in earnest.

The doctor met Mr. Pendleton at the station, and drove him to the house, assuring him that the day they had previously selected for the marriage, then before them, would now meet his engagements exactly.

But this is the evening!

Exactly! I will postpone it for you, No! No indeed! But you must give me a chance to dress.

You have three hours! It is now 5. My friends will assemble at 8. You are my guest.

May was invited while Mark ate his supper, and he was escorted to the spare room where his trunk stood open and every comfort was ready for his toilet.

But a tall, slender, white robed figure, with long lace veil, waited, leaning upon Mr. Trask's arm, when the bridegroom was ready, and slowly advanced with him into the drawing room, filled with friends. The solemn words were spoken, the bridesmaids gently lifted the veil, and Mark saw his wife.

His May, fairer than ever, stood before him her delicate beauty perfectly restored. Upon her head, in place of the heavy braids and coils of hair, were tiny clustered ringlets of gold. Like a baby's the pink mask was gone, and her complexion was delicately fair and pure.

It was a long time afterward that Dr. Trask told his son-in-law: Of course I knew the disfigurement was only temporary, but I thought it was my only test of your affection, and may could not be trusted with any secret that would seem like deceiving you Mark.

So they gave heart to heart in the long summer days, often forgetting even the picture and each other's faces, as they interchanged the deeper soul talk that draws true love in strongest bonds.

The worldly-wise man, the pet of the great city, the artist whose name was a well known one throughout the land, gave his heart to the gentle, sweet girl, who thought heaven was open for her, as she knew the gift of tears.

Dr. Trask gave his consent, sighing a little at the prospect of losing his child, and somewhat consoled by the princely gift of the large painting of spring, where May, in the soft garden, outstretched hands, seemed to stand from the depth of a forest glade to meet him.

The wedding day was fixed for October, and Mark Pendleton returned to Philadelphia to prepare a home for his bride. It was August when he left Wildhaven, and May had great piles of sewing to accomplish, but her lover's parting words were:

Don't work too hard, my darling. I want my little wife's face as fair as spring itself when I come to claim her.

Before he had been two weeks Wildhaven was thrown into terror-stricken suffering by the breaking out of a contagious fever, that spread with lightning rapidity through the entire village. It was so violent, so fatal, that every one spared actual sickness was busy in the care of friend or relative.

May forgot her dainty stitching and ruffling, her coming wedding, and even her happiness in the suffering, around her. In the fearful scorching heat of a long August drought she worked over a hot cooking stove, preparing delicacies for the sick, and carried them herself to the sufferers, the scorching sun beating down upon her with dry burning heat. Often she found the nurse of yesterday the invalid of to-day, and would remain night after night tending the worst cases under her father's care, more than once ending her duty by dressing the dearly-loved friend for the grave.

Her father guarded her by preventatives and precautions as far as possible, but he never stopped her.

"She is doing the work of her heavenly father. He will reward her, and his answer to some few friendly remonstrances, and for a long time it seemed as if the maiden bore indeed a charmed life.

The fever had run its course when in September a cool, wet week broke the oppressive heat, and no new cases occurred afterward except one. But, as that one tore the doctor's heart-strings more than all the rest, for in her room, tossing in delirious agony, May called pitifully for the father she did not recognize, the lover, absent from her, the friends gone from earth forever. Over and over again she lived the painful scenes of the past few weeks, and Mrs. Wells her faithful nurse, knew she stood very near the grave for many long days.

May did not know when Mark Pendleton was sent for and admitted to the darkened room for what they feared was a last gaze at his promised wife.

She did not know when all the glorious profusion of her golden hair was shorn off, to place blades of iron upon her head, she knew nothing of any man, any day, till, waking from a long, deep sleep she saw with clear, comprehending eyes her father's face bending over her.

She smiled, wondering where voice had gone, as she said faintly: "Father!"

And he, softly kissing her eyelids as they closed again, only murmured: "Thank God! My child is spared to me."

There was a long convalescence, and after May could sit up and be dressed. She wondered where her mirror and hand glass had vanished. Mrs. Wells muttered something about Eliza's so careless, always breaking something;

and her father called her little vanity, with a quivering smile, when she asked for them.
