LOVE AND TREAL.

We were all poor in our little village, but some were poorer than others-30 poor that we had not enough black bread to eat-so poor that when the hard winter came creeping in upon us, like some cruel, hungry wolf, we had no brands with which to scare it off.

In Bettina's cottage, where she sat and spun while her childish old grandparents nodded in their chairs beside the fire-place, all was as clean as it could have been in a palace; but she had hard work to fill those two o'd mouths and her own also. There was no one else to do it.

The lady at the great house bought her fax, and paid well for it. But, after all, Bettina had but two hands; and two little brown hands cannot do all the world's work. I used to say to myself that the time would come when Bettina should not work at all-when I would work for both, and for the old people also. That was to be when we were married. Bettina and I had been betrothed two years. We were betrothed still, and no nearer marriage, though I had striven with all my strength.

Wait patiently, Bettina said to me sometimes. What does it matter? We love each other; we trust each other! let us be content.

But I could not be content. Others who were as poor as we married, and left their native land together to seek their fortunes elsewhere. Bettina would gladly have shared my fate, whatever it might have been, but the old grandparents bound her to her cottage and her birth-place.

As for me, I felt that if I would ever win Bettina I must leave Savoy and go to America, where so many of our country people had already gone, and whence they wrote letters that made our hearts beat with hope for the future. In that happy land I might realize my dreams. I told Bettina so, and though she wept she said :

Go, go, Bernard, and I will pray for you. It is all a girl can do. At last I had money for the voyage, I had saved it little by little, for two

Her tears fell over my cheeks. We pressed each other in a long embrace. Ah, if Time only could have stopped in his flight at that moment, leaving us in each other's arms. At last I tore myself away, and blinded by my tears, set off upon my journey.

I had no fear that Lettina would forget me. I knew that the rich young farmer who so often rode many miles to see her, longed for her love, and wooed her with all the art he had; but Bettina loved me, and love is adamantine. Ah! how little did I know of the future at which I then peeped through the golden is dead. glasses of hope and love.

I crossed the sea in safety. I stood at last in a strange land among strange I found work at once. Living as we voice? Speak. Savoyards live at home, I spent little. Week by week the little heap in my about my neck, and a wet cheek touch mole-skin pouch grew greater. I was mine and a whisper came : gloriously happy. I wrote joyful letters to Bettina. She answered me as hope- Do you not know your own Bettina? fully. It is little to tell, but, ah, it was so much to fee! and to do!

And I know that tenderly.

I tried to rise. I could not. Where am I? I said, and my voice sounded low and hoarse in my own ears. Who is this?

It is the doctor, [said a voice. Be Steam calm, my friend. Is it night? I asked.

It is right, said a voice. Why do you not light a lamp? He made no answer. What has happened?

Do you not remember? I remember a noise! It was an explosion, he said, after a pause. You were hurt. There were many killed outright. Doctor, I said, it is night?

It is night, he said solemnly.

But only for me, I said. I know it. I am smitten blind. Try to be calm, my friend, he whispered. It is hard-but try to bear it.

What can we do but bear what God, sends upon us? But I did not bear it well. Can you wonder? All was gone -all my hopes of life, and even all that I had won in the past year. Some wretch had stolen the mole-skin pouch from my bosom. I was a beggar and on board at 20c. Card Tickets, good fer 20 or blind. I prayed to die, but I lived, and at last grew strong again.

One day as I sat by the hospital window I formed a resolution. I said to will, on and after Monday 23rd May, leave Chatmyself I can at least be brave enough to spare Bettina something , and I will do it, though my suffering should be increased by the act. I know that if she knew the truth sho would grieve bitterly and remain true to me. I know that if I were sent home as the doctor says I must be, she would be constant forever -she would even marry me, and try to feed me as she does her helpless ones. That shall never be. I will send her word that I am dead, and then when she has grieved awhile, youth will triumph; she will marry the young farmer who loves her so truly, and is good as well as rich, and she will only remember poor Bernard tenderly as one who loved her in the past, and young Bernard is really dead. This blind beggar is not the same man. The good dcctor shall write me a let-
