THE SILVERSPINS.

There were four Miss Silverspins, and Leona, the youngest of all, was married first. Miss Silverspin was literary, corresponded with two or three country newspapers, wrote essays, and even tried her hand at poetry. Miss Eudora Silverspin was domestic, kept a big receipt book, counted the bars of soap, and nearly drove the one maid of all work distracted with her constant criticisms and surveillance. Miss Rebecca, the third, belonged to the congregation of "St. Petrifactus-in the Highway," was one of the sisterhood, and visited the poor until the poor were heartily sick of her. And little Leona, the eighteenyear-old "baby" of the family, was considered as good for nothing in particular, except to be snubbed, scolded, and ordered around by all three of her sisters, until Mr. Motley came along and married her. 'The man must be crazy to fancy 3 chit of a thing like Nora,' said Miss Silverspin. 'I did think he had some literary taste but of course he can't have, when he is satisfied with a wife who can never read Carlysle, and knows nothing about Hume and Macaulay.

'One would suppose,' added Miss Eudora, acrimoniously, 'that a man would select for a life companion one who understands the art of kousekeeping, and can make his home comfortable! Leona never baked a biscuit in her life, and as for preserving I don't think she knows the difference between a damsen and a green-gage!'

"All this is mere folly and trifling," said the sister of St. Petrifactus, rolling her eyes skyward. 'No man who is entirely devoid of the devotional element can be expected to show common sense in his matrimonial choice.'

'Leona knows nothing at all about him,' said Miss Silverspin sharply. 'He may be a mere imposter, for any thing we know,' said Miss Eudora. 'Leona will be sure to repent her headlong haste one of these days,' said Miss Rebecca.

But in spite of all this croaking, little Leona was as happy as a bird. She loved John Motley, and John Motley Mrs. Annie Walsh. Good Stabling on the premloved her. What else was wanting to complete her bliss. She went to housekeeping in a little bird's nest of a house, with the curtains all looped back with blue ribbons, and plants and canary birds in every window, and the three Miss Silverspins came there frequently to breakfast, dinner, and tea, although they took no pains to conceal their disapprobation of her match.

'Nothing but an engraver,' said Miss Silverspin, sourly. 'I did think, Leona you would have looked higher.' 'It's a very respectable business, I am sure,' said Leona, timidly. 'You'll be sure to repent of it one of these days,' said Miss Eudora. 'I'm sure I don't know why,' said Leona, ready to cry.

'He is a free-thinker and an infidel,' groaned Rebecca.

ened at her own boldness. 'He reads the Bible every day, and is very regular at church. 'It's all a whited sepulcher,' sighed the sister of St. Petrifactus. 'I wish they'd all get married, too, thought Leona, 'and then perhaps, they'd have enough to do attending to their husband to keep away from here!' The next week the three sisters arrived enmasse, with faces a yard long and eyes aglitter with gloomy triumph. 'I told you so,' said Miss Silverspoon. 'I foresaw it from the very beginning,' said Rebecca. 'Its no more than you might have expected,' added Eudora. 'Do speak out!' cried bewildered

Leona. 'I don't at all understand what you mean!' 'Did you know, wretched child,' said

Miss Silverspin, leaning forward and NEW altering her voice to a sepulchral key, that your husband has had another wife?' 'Of course I knew that he was a widower,' said Leona, much relieved. Garden Peas and Beasn &c. 'Do you suppose he has any secrets from me?' 'But did you know,' struck in the devotee of the saint with the stony name, 'that the first Mrs. Motely is still living?'

'Nonsense,' said Leona. 'She died within six months of their marriage, and is buried at Milwaukee.'

'Poor deceived lamb!' groaned Eudora. 'She's living now. It was 'not even a divorce; only a legal separation, and he has no more right to get married than-than any man that is tied tight and fast to a living wife!'

Leona turned very pale. 'That is false?' she cried. 'You are deceiving me.'

'Seeing is believing,' said Mrs. Silverspin. 'She's down stairs in the reception room.'

'Who is?' gasped Leona. 'The first Mrs. Motley!'

Leona started up with glittering eyes and crimson cheeks. 'How dare she come here ? Here to my very house!' she cried out.

'Because she wants her husband, said Eudora. 'Be calm, child, I entreat. Sister Rebecca, lead in the real Mrs. Motley.'

And before Leona could utter words to remonstrate a tall female wearing blue spectacles and a water-proof suit stalked in.

'Who are you?' cried Leona, starting up. 'And what do you want?'

'I am Mrs. John Motley,' answered the gaunt female, with a wave of her umbrella, 'and I want my hunband. He married me out West three years ago and he's cleared out and don't allow me one penny of maintenance. And he's been gone and married again, and I'll have him up for bigamy as sure as my name is Philis Maria Motley! What's the use of laws, if this is the way a respectacle woman is to be swindled out of her support?' Leona sank back pale and startled, as if she had seen a ghost. And so she had-not only the ghost of the woman she had deemed dead and in her grave years ago, but the sheeted specter of her own married love and happiness. Poor, trembling, pallid little Leona . And the three Miss Silverspins stood around, triumphing in her dismay, like exultant ghouls, crying in one voice:

'Didn't we tell you so?'

and in walked Mr. John Motley him-

'Hallo!' cried he. 'What's the matter, Leo? What's all this about?' 'Deceiver!' shrieked Miss Silverspin.

'Bigamist!' shouted Miss Rebecca.

'Are you all mad?' said Mr. Motley, looking from one to the other. 'John, who is that? Speak!' sobbed out poor Leona, pointing to the tall woman in the blue spectacles.

'I am hanged if I know,' said Mr. Motley, looking her full in the face. The three Miss Silverspins stared. 'She said she was your first wife,' cried they in chorus. 'She said she wasn't divorced—only legally separated She said your were her lawful husband, and that Leona wasn't your wife at all.' 'Then she has told a pack of confounded lies?' roared John Motley, with flashing eyes.

'Isn't this man your husband?' demanded Miss Silverspin, chaking the tall stranger by the shoulder.

'No, he ain't,' sheepishly confessed the soi-distant Mrs. Motley. 'My husband's name is John Motley, but he hain't this man at all. My husband is tall and stout, with red hair and whiskers, face marked with small-pox, and only one eye.

'There's a John Motley keeps a grocery store down by the river,' said the other possessor of that name. 'Perhaps-'

'That's him,' said the spectacled one, with alacrity. 'He always knowed a heap about the grocery business. He's pretty sly' but he can't dodge me.' And exit the would-be destroyer of Leona Motley's domestic peace. The three Miss S.lverspins retreated in disorder, mutually reproaching one another. Leona had a good cry and laugh on her husband's shoulder, and Mr. Motley registered, then and there, a solemn vow that the three sisters-inlaw should keep out of the house there-

And he kept it, too.
