My heart holds hard to the old law made for the women of our race by ancient wisdom: "Wed not boys, but wed grave and gentle men. For women would be ruled and who, of pride and fire, would be ruled by striplings." And again, "Let ivy seek the full grown oak, not cling to saplings." I love the laws that were, love the old faiths and customs. They filled the world with beauty and brave men. They gave great nature opportunity to keep great, kept noble blood from base, strength from wedding weakness and barred out mongrelism from the world, which in the ancient days was deadliest mistake, saying:

right or wrong?"

To which the girl made answer. Norton, and this judgment fits the the holy man, the symbol on whose ancient wisdom. For in the beginning breast was known to our old race and so it was. The male built nest, the female feathered it with song. So each had part in common ministry. The hem. So shall the symbol of the old man was greater, richer than the woman and with earthly substance did endow.

And she in turn gave sweet companion
rise and the sunset of the world; and And she in turn gave sweet companionship, and sang loneliness from his life with mother songs and children's prattle. Thus in the beginning, yea, thou art right as thou art always right. For being sound in heart and head thou can'st not err. Thy judgment goes straight to the center of the truth as goes thy bullet. But as man lived and died, change came to the first order. For men without male issue died and left great dower to girls. Women, by no fault of theirs, nor lack of modesty grew rich by gifts of death which are the gifts of fate. And changing circumstance changed all, making the old law void. The gods pondered and a new void. The gods pondered and an ew void was truer to itself, less vagrant, purer, better kept. And women of red blood and pure, clothed in royalty from shame, made alliances with men whom their souls loved and gave rank, wealth and their sweet selves in lavishness of loving which gives all and keeps nothing back. Such was the habit of my race and line to my race and line with he sunset of the world; and the God of morning and of evening, be proved to be, the same, though worshipped under different names." He yielded, and the two made ready to set face toward Mamelons.

There was, serving in her house, an old red servitor, who had been chief, in other days, of Mistassinni. His dwind-led tribe lives still upon the Lake which reaches northward beyond knowledge. But he, longer than her life, had lived in the great house, a life-long guest, but serving it, in his wild fashion. Warring, with Nashquapees and Mountaineers against Esquimaux, he had been overtone in ambush and in the center of their camp put to the terture. Grimly he stood the test of fire, not making moan as their knives seamed hum and the headed spearpoints seared. Maddened, they pried his shut jaws apart with edge of hatchet and tore his tongue out, saying, in develish jest, "If you will not talk you have no need of this," and ate it before his eyes. Then, the Chief, with twice a hundred braves, burst in upon them and whirled t Such was the habit of my race and line from age to age, even as I read you from the pictured scroll, relled in foil of gold, that only I of all the world, can read: and if I die, leaving no child, the golden secret goes with me to the gods and all the ancient lore is lost to men forever. This to assist your judgment and make the scales hang level from your hand for just decision. Am I to blame because I stand as heir to ancient blood and wealth? Shall these wide acres, gold in yonder house, gems in casket and diamonds worn for ten thousand years by women of my race, Queens of the olden time, when in their hands they lifted world-wide sceptres, divide thee and me? Has love no weight in the just scales you, by the Such was the habit of my race and line upon them and whirled the hellish divide thee and me? Has love no weight in the just scales you, by the working of some old fate, I know not what, hold over me and my souls wish, to-day? Be just to your own soul, be just to mine and fling these doubts aside as settled forever by the mighty power that works in darkness and through darkness to the light, shaping our fates and ordering life and death, joy and grief, beyond our power to fix j met here. His nature, unrestrained, leaped up, in a red rush of joy, to eyes and face. He lifted hands and opened arms to her. To them she swept, as bird into safe thicket, chased by hawk, with a glad cry. Panting she lay upon his bosom, trembling through all her frame, placed mouth to his and lost all sense but feeling. Then, with a gasp, drew back, and lifted dewy eyes to his, as fed child to a mother's face or saint lifts worshipping gaze to God.

But the gods of her old race, standing beyond sunset, lifted high, saw farther on the sandy slope of Mamelons, and while she lay in heaven on her lover's breast, they bent low their heads and
