He was barely 45 years of age and was a robust man, as straight as an arrow. About three years before, he had become the husband of a young girl of 20, a niece of the tax collector, and whom he had loved with frenzy.

Of course, once dead, Mr. Mathias was credited with having been, during his life-time, the possessor of every vir-tue. It would have gone hard with the one who should have dared speak of him as having been a usurper or miser, as people termed him while liv-

No one would have dreamed of publishing anew the account of that celebrated marriage, which certainly did him ne honor, and which would have brought back to mind the remembrance how all had feared that tall, artful, avaricious and rich man whom people supposed to occupy his spare moments in concocting poisons, with which he experimented on dogs. It was no time to talk about that then. He was dead. Peace to his ashes!

After all, in thinking the matter over, was there anything so very extra ordinary in this death? It was plain that Mr. Mathias had had forebodings of its approach, for had he not, but a short time before, sent to Paris for workmen to erect in the cemetary the mortuary chapel that was at that moment waiting to receive his mortal remains? Besides, it had been noticed that of late he had prowled about his house as if fearing mysterious robbers. He sequested his wife and closed himself up for weeks at a time in his laboratory, the chimney of which seemed in a blaze every night. 'All these were the premouitory symptoms of a brain trouble!' had said Dr. Labarre, who had decided that death had resulted from apoplexy.

Mr. Mathias had had a splendid funeral. One-third of the population of the town had followed his remains to the graveyard, and it may even be said that there were a few moist eyes when the oaken coffin was lowered into the crypt of the chapel, a real monument in itself, where two men of his size might have slept at their ease. The mourners returned from the funeral, wondering what the wido would do. Now, the truth of the matter is that lived, and made hin enter a room on

Mr. Mathias was not dead.

Two hours after the ceremony, any-one who might have been in the vault where the coffin rested would have certified to the truth of this statement. Two sharp clicks, like the snap of a spring, resounded, and the coffin opened like a closet. Mr. Mathias sat up, stretching his limbs like a man just waking up. Through a grating in the ceiling, a little light entered. Mr. joke at my expense. Mathias stood up, slowly rubbing his slightly benumbed knees.

Taking all in all, he felt comfortable, quite comfortable. The dose of the narcotic, which he had carefully measured before taking, had had the exact effect desired. People had supposed I shall pay you well. him dead, and had buried him, so much the better.

In the graveyard only would he wear his shroud, to be in keeping with the pre-dominating color of the locality. Once over the wall, he would hie straight to his wife's apartment. Then the fun would begin.

Mr. Mathias dressed himself, and everything being all right, he tilted over the marble slab covering the vault, climbed up into the mortuary chapel, opened the door and walked out into the graveyard, with his winding sheet on his arm.

As soon as he got into the alley he unfolded the ample shroud and tried to cast it around his shoulders. But the sheet was quite heavy, and he failed in his attempt. Just as he was about to try it over he heard a voice behind him say:

'Hold on, I will give you a hand.' Not to realize what a disagreeable surprise this was, would be a certain proof that one had never been seen, at midnight, in a graveyard trying to put on one's shroud. The voice that had addressed Mr. Mathias came from the sexton of the erns. He drew near and looking Mr.

Mathias full in the face, exclaimed :

'Hello! is that you, Mr. Mathias?

Grimbot stepped back, exclaiming; "What! the key! you want to go out! That's a funny notion! But I say, none that !'
