A PILOT'S TREACHERY.

AN ENCOUNTER WITH THE FREEBOOTERS OF MALACCA. The main body of the pirates, those who were evidently intending to board us on the port, advanced exceedingly slow, delaying their progress until their confederates, who were to strike at other portions of the ship, had reached the positions for which they had set out, and ere long a fierce shout echoed across the water, which caused a grand rush of all the boats for our vessel. On they came, brandishing their weapons and yelling like fiends incarnate. It was a moment of terrible suspense and mental torture, yet the men stood at their posts and awaited their onset. Capt. Barlow stood beside the men who were to meet the main body of the enemy on the port side of the ship; Carter, the first officer, with others, looked after the starboard side, while Decker and Walker, second and third mates, took care of bow and stern, respectively. Lashing the wheel, I took my place by the side of the third mate, as one of the defenders of the and a number of French officers. after part of the ship.

A heavy charge of grape created terrible havoc among the occupants of two of the advancing boats, but it did not serve to retard the progress of the others approaching from the same quarter; on the contrary, it only served to make them redouble their efforts, and soon the entire herd of yelling demons were alongside, and engaged in a desperate struggle to clamber up the vessel's side. The scene that followed was one that can never be depicted on paper. The rattle of guns and revolvers, the yells of the pirates and the cheers of the men, created a volume of discordant sounds that was ear-splitting. The crew fought with the ferocity of tigers, and notwithstanding the terrible odds the boarders were defeated again and again in their efforts to gain the deck, and their numbers were rapidly being decimated, as the floating bodies of their boldest adventurers clearly attested. But one attempt was made to board the stern of the ship, and this wet with such a vigorous resistance that those who survived the attempt hastened to the reinforcement of the party with whom Capt. Barlow and his men were contending for the mastery. Here, ere long, the whole force of the battle was concentrated, the pirates giving up the attempt to reach the deck from any other quarter, owing to the determined manner in which every such attempt was met and frustrated.

As soon as the fight assumed this phase, the major portion of the men were drawn from their positions in other portions of the ship to aid Capt. Barlow, leaving only enough behind to keep a close watch, and to give the alarm in case some of the assailants, unobserved, should detach themselves from the main body and pay their attention to parts that were unprotected.

The port side of the ship fairly swarmed with Malays, all engaged in fierce efforts to gain her deck, and keeping up a continual series of yells, intermingled with cries of pain, as some were knock- Mr. DeSoyres, is a graduate of Caius coled bleeding into the water. So great | lege, Cambridge. were the number that had thus succumbed to the keen blades of the cutlasses that the black paint which adorned the larboard side of the ship was thickly bespattered with crimson, while the water had a deep bloody tinge.

The great number of the assailants was manifested by the readiness with which every gap that was carved in the ranks of the boarding party was filled by fresh accessions from the boats, while our own men began to exhibit the evidences of the great physical strain to which they were subjected. Three men had fallen from bullets fired from the boats, and one was incapacitated by a severe wound. Those four made a very serious gap in our little band of defenders, and one that we could not fill. The death of their comrades seemed to exert a terrific influence over the men, and seemed to animate them with an intense desire for revenge. Several times had a few Malays gained the deck, only to be dashed headlong into the water before the impetuosity and superior prowess of the sailors.

At one of the most critical moments | Chatham, N. B. of the conflict, and when it appeared as though the men must give ground from sheer exhaustion, the cook, a burly Scotchman, who hitherto had taken slight part in the defence, issued from the galley with a huge boiler full of scalding water and tugging it to the vessel's side that had been the scene of the hardest fighting, he, with the assistance of one of the crew, raised the vessel on the ship's rail and dashed the en- TRADING COMPANY, tire contents down upon the mass of brown-skinned miscreants that were crowded together preparatory to making another struggle for the deck. Such a chorus of screams as issued from the throats of those who had been the recipients of the fiery liquid never before was heard in that latitude. All of them dove into the water, and the aquatic gymnastics which they performed, coupled with their piercing yells of pain, proved how efficacious was Scotty's novel method of repelling boarders. The scalding water did more to terrorize the Malays than did the large number of their force who with cloven skulls floated about the ship, terrible evidence of the execution that had been done by our brave little band of defenders. The success attending the cook's performance was hailed by the crew with wild shouts, which were continued, as it was seen that the foe did not quite understand this mode of warfare, and were rather chary of exposing themselves. The manner in which the hot water had disconcerted the pirates had one good effect, inasmuch as it gave the crew brief breathing spell after their arduous labors; but the Malays did not intend to give up the contest just then, and soon they were making a desperate attempt again to mount the deck.

Again the fight was waged hotly, and while the tumult was at its height, a light was noticed in motion toward the southeast. Capt. Barlow's attention was attracted to the light, and immediately he gave it as his opinion that a vessel was approaching. The gun was charged and fired to signal the stranger, and scarcely had the echoes died away when there came a heavy answering intonation that was received by our men with wild cheers. The pirates, as soon as the sound of the stranger's shot was heard, scrambled into their boats and darted away toward the shore, leaving some of their late associates who were unable to get aboard to either swim to the land or drown. We gave them a parting shot of grape as they hurried off, and soon the vessel that had been signalled so opportunely bore down toward us. She proved to be the French sloop of war Austerlitz, DeVillers, commander. In a few moments a boat came alongside, and upon receiving word of the peril from which we had been rescued, and the fact that we had several of our men suffering from severe wounds, the surgeon of the Austerliaz came on board and treated our wounded comrades. Just as the dawn was breaking, the three poor fellows who had met their deaths while so nobly defending their ship, were committed to their last resting-place at the bottom of the strait, the burial service being read upon the Orient's deck by Capt. Barlow, in the presence of our own men

We proceeded down the strait accompanied by the war vessel, and, thanks to the skill of the French surgeon, our injured seamen soon recovered from their wounds, and were able to resume their duties. The pilot who had been instrumental in bringing about the terrible experiences through which we had passed was sentenced to be hung from the yard arm, and on that bright September afternoon the culprit was taken upon the deck, and in the presence of the officers and men of both vessels, he was suspended from a spar in midair, his life forfeited for his treachery. The body was then cut down and buried beneath the waves.

We were accompanied by the French sloop-of-war as far as Cape Romania, where we separated, the Austerlitz going south to Batavia, while the Orient headed northward through the China Sea for Canton.
