'The woman of our race get what they crave. My child shall be a woman, and being so, win what she plays for.' And, Lo! she had her wish, for when the babe was born, it was a girl.

So died he. On the third day they built his bier in the great hall and placed him on it, stripped, like a warrior, to his waist, for so he charged the Trapper it should be. Thus sitting in the Hamburg by losing speculations in sugar the gales, made by their heat, blow hot a thousand miles across the land, dropped on this Island like help from heaven.

Twice was I saved from death by thee.

This heart, a life of great knots, guilling and ordorous flaring strongly on the hearth, the two, each guided by the faith that prompted, made for the dead Chief of a dead tribe strange funeral. Twice she was rescued at the peril of thy life, mother and child, by thy quick hand snatched out of death. And when The Trapper, standing at the dead man's feet, took from her hand, a book and read: the cursed fever came, and I and she lay, like two burns brands, you nursed us both and from your arms, at last her eyes upon you lovingly, her soul unwillingly went from us. And her sweet body, instinct with the old grace and the little and labors with the words, sounded, through the great hall, solemnly.

Then the girl, standing by his side, in the release of the provider of her beauty, the lights. untimely frost, while yet it's royal bloom | the words the Trapper had intoned. is opening to the sun, lies, leaf loosened, a lovely ruin rudely made on the harsh gravel walk." Here the Chief stopped short, struck through and through with sharp pains. His face whitened and he groaned. The spasm passed, but left rose to the hewn rafters and swelled him weak. Rallying, with effort, he would break out of such imprisonment, "I must be brief. That spasm is the second. The third will end me. God! How the old stab jumps to-night!

Trapper, you know how wide our titles reach. A hundred miles from East to West, from North to South, the manor runs. It is a princely stretch.
A time will come when cities will be on it, and it's deed of warranty be worth a as if from the eld race, that lived in the kingdom. Would that a boy, outside dawn of the world, whose blood was in the deadly limits of the cross, but dashed with the old red blood in vein and skin, might be born, to heir the place | run thrilling through the happy air when and live as master on these lakes and the stars of the morning sang together hills, where the great Chiefs, who bore for joy. the Tortoise sign upon their breasts Alas, that such a voice from the old when it upheld the world, beyond the days of soul and song should be smothyears of mortal memory, lived and hunted! For when the doom in the far past, before one of our blood had ever seen the Salted shore, was spoken, and fight again at Mamelons, to see the old doom broken and a boy, with one trace of red blood, in vein and skin, ruling as master here! And I who die an heirloom of her mother's race, old, ed, half a thousand miles, to ask with dying breath the question—

May not that boy be born, the old race kept alive, the long curse stayed, and ended, with my life, forever be the doom of Mamelons? Speak, Trapper, friend, comrade in war, in hunt and hall. Speak to my failing ear, that I may die exultant and tell the thousand chiefs that throng to greet me in the Spirit land, that the old doom is lifted and a race with blood of theirs in skin and vein shall live and rule forever mid' their native hills?"

From the first word, the strange tale,

From the first word, the strange tale, half chanted, had rolled on, like the great river, flooding upward from the Gulf, between narrowing banks with swift and swifter motion, growing pent and tremulous as it flows, until it challenges the base of Cape Tourmente, with thunder. And not until the dying Chief, with headlong haste, had launched the query whose answer would fix the bounds of fate forever, did the the bounds of fate forever, did the hand and the sweet lips which drawn | FLOUR PRODUCE AND PROVISIUS Trapper dream whither the wild tale tended.
