

A GHOST STORY.

There was a large party of commercial travellers in the smoking-room of the "George." One of us had started the subject of ghosts, and we were very merry over stories of folk, fad and sober, who imagined they had seen a ghost and afterwards from them.

"What did Harris mean by the 'man of my dreams,'" said one of us, "and what became of him?" "He was hanged at Edinburgh," replied Peter, "My saluting him by the name of his victim and staring at him so earnestly made such an impression on his mind that he constantly dreamed of me pursuing him to hand him over to justice and level I did. That's my story. You see I have good reason for not thinking ghosts a fit subject for laughter."

"Thinking over a good thing, Peter," said some one. "You are very quiet to-night."

"I don't like your joking about the subject," said he, seriously. "I once saw a real ghost."

"Every eye was instantly turned on him at this announcement. Peter took a sip of toddy and proceeded to refill his pipe, remarking at the same time, 'It happened a long time ago; before a lot of you fellows were born.'"

"Our curiosity being excited, we pressed him to relate his experience. 'It was about forty years ago,' he said, 'I was quite a young fellow, but I held some very good commissions in the wine trade. A traveller's life was very different then; there were no railways; I did most of my journeys in a light gig. I had been up through the highlands as far as Inverness, and was driving over to Elgin, when I saw the ghost. It was a bright light, a little and wind and hail sprang up, and I made but slow progress. Darkness set in while I was still some miles from the town. The wind was cold and piercing, and that fell like drops of molten lead upon my face. I don't know that I ever was more miserable. However, I comforted myself as well as I could, and longed earnestly for John Laing's friends. He had been a customer of mine, and I was on the road before me. I was always sure of a good order and warm welcome from old John Well, I say, I was heartily wishing myself at his bedside over a tumbler of toddy, when the wind lulled a little and the moon came out, and to my surprise I saw coming towards me no other than John Laing himself, accompanied by a tall, dark-looking man."

"Why, cried I, are you so far from town on such a night, as Laing? He did not answer, but walked on, and as he passed I leaned over the gig side to repeat my question. Great Heaven! his throat seemed cut from ear to ear, and in his hand he carried a razor dripping with blood! I sat spell-bound watching them, till the moon once more becoming obscured, I lost sight of them in the darkness. The cold sweat was standing like beads on my forehead, and I trembled in every limb. My horse had been strangely restless since the two appeared, and now that they were behind him, he set off for Elgin, despite the wind and rain, as if the devil were in him. 'I drove straight to John Laing's house,' 'And found your friend all safe and sound,' broke in one of us, with a laugh. Peter bent forward, and said solemnly, 'I found that he had been not in bed that morning with his throat cut from ear to ear.'"

"A cry of horror broke from us, but Peter, waving his hand to command silence, continued, 'The motive of the crime was clearly robbery. John Laing did not believe in banks. He had a small safe in his bedroom, in which he kept his savings. It was open and empty.' 'Was the criminal ever found?' asked some one. 'A stranger—a tall, dark man—had been hanging about one of the hotels for some days. He disappeared at the time of the murder, and I was on my bill, but all efforts to find him failed. I waited for poor Laing's funeral, and then made my way southward. When I went to square up I found that the firm from whom I held my best commissions had taken in a partner, and as he was to travel, I was no longer required. The others I held were not much to depend on, so I looked about, and at last got a start from a large grain store in the town, and so I covered the south of Scotland, and so into England as Newcastle. On my first journey to the latter place I put up at the 'Piercy Arms,' a nice new hotel. I got on very well, and booked some large orders. One evening, as I was returning rather late than usual, I encountered a tall, dark-haired man in the hotel lobby. He seemed agitated by my appearance, and gesticulated wildly saying, 'The man in the dream!' He was in such a state of terror that I looked closely and curiously at him. I felt a cold shiver come over me as I recognized him. He was the ghostly man I had seen when the blood stained razor that fearful night. He recovered his composure long before I did, and said, with an attempt at a smile, I have to apologise for my rudeness. I am the landlord, Mr. Harris. I was practising for private theatricals, and I hope you did not think me mad. I tried to look as if his explanation were quite satisfactory, and declining his invitation to step into the bar-parlour, passed on to my room. I did not sleep that night. I lay tossing and bed, trying to unravel my thoughts about the matter, but it was no use. The house seemed strangely quiet, and an eerie feeling which I had about me since my encounter in the lobby became more and more intensified. The shutting of a door somewhere downstairs seemed to break the spell. I bounded out of bed and pulled up my blind. It was a beautiful moonlight night, almost clear enough to read by, and to my surprise I saw the landlord, Mr. Harris, sneaking down the street, with a small black bag in his hand. My mind was instantly made up to follow him. I watched him turn to the left, and, hastily dressing, followed as fast as I could. As I suspected he went straight to the docks. The tide was almost full, and the London boat would sail in an hour. I saw him aboard, and then looked about for a policeman. I had resolved to venture on a bold stroke. Fortunately I easily secured a constable, and telling him I wished to arrest a man, he accompanied me. When Harris saw me come aboard with the police he turned ashly pale. 'I accuse this man of the murder of John Laing in Elgin,' I said. 'It's a lie!' he shouted in an agony of fear as the officers seized him. 'Now that he was captured, the full responsibility of my situation flashed on me. I had absolutely no evidence against the man—nothing but my own mere conviction, the reason of which I felt sure would only be laughed at by any one else. As we walked to the Police Office the prisoner continued to glance sideways at me, and to mutter to himself. By a great effort I managed to hear, 'The man of my dream—the man of my dream.'"

"Yes, I said, 'the man of your dream?' He starting at my repeating his words, and the policeman, tightened their hold of him, thinking he meant resistance. 'You need not be afraid,' he said in a shaky voice, 'I won't try to escape; I'll confess all when we get in.' 'And he did confess. He was the very man. He had Elgin murder, the deed was done till darkness fell, then he stole out of the town. He passed me on the road, and was terrified by my halting him by the name of his victim and staring at him so earnestly. How I came to see my poor old friend by his side, or to see himself carrying the 'Wpon with which he did the awful deed, no one could ever explain. I have always held that it was a vision permitted me, that I might avenge the death of my poor old friend."

GENERAL NOTES AND NEWS

Hon. James McShane announces his retirement from office. Like a Thief in the Night. Cramp is a disease which strikes quickly and severely. To be prepared for this dangerous disease a bottle of Hagar's Yellow Oil should be kept in the house, it is a prompt and sure remedy.

The Four Cardinal Points.

The four cardinal points of health are the stomach, the liver, the kidneys and the blood, any failure of their action brings disease and derangement to the whole system. Regulate their condition with Burdock Blood Bitters to secure perfect health.

Remove the Cause.

To remedy an evil the cause must be removed. It is by opening the clogged avenues of the system and thus removing the impure poisonous and worn out matter which is the cause of disease that B.B.B. is so uniformly successful in overcoming all diseases of the Stomach, Liver, Kidneys and Blood.
