Stanley's Character.

The world has already, and with among those who possess not an adventitious and temporary, but real and enduring greatness. Without any air of birth and office he has performed during these twenty years unequalled feats of courage and endurance commanding the highest honor. He has and to describe Stanley without reference to the land in which he has spent most of his days since 1871 would be to describe the plot of Hamlet without reference to the Prince of Denmark himself. He is a Napoleon for largeness of conception, a will of steel, and personal courage. It would be satisfactory if we could pause here and not have to push the parallel farther. But as with all men of genius and determination, his object and his object rection of its attainment. He sees his goal, and he presses towards it through all danger, all privation and all diffi culties. All who implicity obey him and efficiently assist him receive their meed of secondary praise; but for those who fail, whether through his own miscalculation or their own errors, he has nothing but censure, which is all the more galling when it takes the form of contemptuous excuse. We are sorry to say that "gloria victis" is a motto with which Mr. Stanley is evi dently unacquainted. The wondrous success which has attended his career has made him intolerant of failure, and perhaps incapable of judging of his own contributions towards it. Taking his to the advantage of the more modern explorer. He is a regular Bible-reader even in the camp; and he is an enthusiast. That he is a strong man, full of courage and swift in resourceful action, all men know; but he insists on taking note of something higher and deeper, the irresistible impulse arising from conscious, almost audible, contact
