THOS. IX NELSC AN ADVANCE SHEET.

Many years ago I lived for some time in the neighborhood of a private lunatic asylum, kept by my old fellow-student, Dr. Warden, and, having always been disposed to specialize in the subject of mental disease, I often availed myself of his permission to visit and study the various cases placed under his charge. In one among these, that of a patient whom I will call John Lynn, I came to feel a peculiar interest, apart from scientific considerations. He was a young man of about twenty-five, handsome, gentlemanlike, and to a superficial observer apparently quite free from any symptoms of his malady. His intellectual powers were far above the average, and had been highly trained; in fact, the strain of preparing for a brilliantly successful university examination had proved the cause of a brain fever, followed by a long period of depression, culminating in more than one determined attempt at suicide, which had made it necessary to place him under surveillance. When I first met him he had spent six months at Greystones House, and was, in Dr. Warden's opinion, making satisfactory progress towards complete recovery. His mind seemed to be gradually regaining its balance, his spirits their elasticity, and the only unfavorable | tone. feature in his case was his strong taste for abstruse metaphysical studies, which could not be prevented from occasionally indulging. But a spell of Kant and Hartmann, Comte and Hamilton, and Co., was so invariably followed by a more or less retrograde period of excitement and dejection, that Dr. Warden warded with success. My acquaintance with him was severa! months old, when, one fine midsummer day, I called at Greystones House after an unusually long absence of a week or more. The main object of my visit was to borrow a book from John Lynn, and accordingly, after a short conversation with Dr. Warden, I asked whether . could see him. "Ob, certainly," said the doctor; "I'm afraid, though, that you won't find him over-flourishing. He's been at that confounded stuff Skleegel and Ficty and, Skuppenhoor"-my friend is no German scholar, and his eccentric pronunciation seemed to accentuate the scoruful emphasis which he laid upon each obnoxious name-"hammer and tongs ever since last Monday, and you know that always means mischief with him. To-day, however, he has apparently taken to Berkeley and Horbert Spencer, which is a degree better, and he was talking about you at luncheon, which thought rather a good sign; so perhaps he may come round this time without much trouble." Having reached John Lynn's apart ments, however, I did not feel disposed to adopt the doctor's hopeful view. For though he appeared outwardly composed and collected-epithets which, indeed, always sound a warning note-there was a restlessness in the young man's glance and a repressed enthusiasm in his tone. whence I augured no good. Moreover, I found it quite impossible to steer our conversation out of the channel in which his thoughts were setting; and this was the atomic theory. I did my best for some time, but to no purpose at all. The atoms and molecules drifted into everything, through the most improbable crevices, like the dust of an Australian whirlwind. They got into sport and politics, and the current piece of parochial start of it—five years, I should say or success. gossip-which really had not the remotest connection with any scientific subject -and the latest novel of the season, albeit the time of the modern metaphysical romance was not yet. So at length, abandoning the bootless struggle, I resolved to let him say his say, and the consequence was that after some halfhour's discourse, which I will not tempt the reader to skip, I found myself meekly assenting to the propositions of the infinitude of the material universe, and the aggregation and vibration of innumerable homogenous atoms as the origin of all things, from matter to emotion, from the four-inch brick to the poet's dream of the

"Oh, well," I said, in a studiously bored and cold-waterish way, "perhaps these speculations may be interesting enough-not that they ever struck me as particularly so. But what do they all come to? It seems to me quite easy to understand why scientists, as you say, ignore them. They've good reason to do that, with so much more promising material on hand. Why should they waste their time over such hopeless hypotheses-or facts, whichever you like?"

"Then, conceding them to be facts, you consider that they can have no practical significance for science?" said John Lynn, with a kind of latent triumph in his

For, look here, assuming the facts to be as I have stated, the explanation is simply this: the clairvoyant has somehow got a glimpse into one of these facsimile worlds, which happens to be a few years ahead of ours in point of time and has seen how things are going on

"Really, my good fellow," I interposed considering the billions and quintillions of miles which you were talking about so airily just naw, the simplicity of the explanation is scarcely so apparent as one "However, it's an immense advance, I can tell you, upon any one that has

Contrast it with the other difficulty of supposing somebody to have seen something which actually does not exist, and you'll see that the two are altogether disparate. In short, the whole thing seems clear enough to me on a priori grounds; but, no doubt, that may partly be because I am to a certain extent independent of them, as I've lately had an opportunity of visiting a planet which differs from this one solely in having had a small
