"Well, as you may suppose, such an abrupt change of scene is a rather startling experience; and I must frankly confess that I haven't at present the wildest idea how it was effected" ("Hear hear." said I), "any more than you can explain how certain vibrations in the air are at this moment producing sounds causing in your brain other vibrations, which we would call a belief that I am either raving or romancing. But the strange feeling-which in itself proves that it wasn't a dream, for who ever is surprised at anything in one?-wore off before long, and I began to make observations. As for the time of day, one could see by the shadows and dew on the grass that it was morning, a considerably earlier hour than it had been here when I quitted Greystones abruptly; and the trees and flowers showed that it was early summer. Nobody was visible about the place, but I heard the scraping of a rake upon gravel somewhere near, whence I inferred the vicinity of a gardener. After standing still for what seemed a considerable length of time-I had forgotten to put on my watch, and so could only guess-I resolved upon committing a trespass to the extent of seeking out this man, in hopes of thus gaining some clue to the maze of mystery at the heart of which I had suddenly been set, and as preliminary framed several questions ingeniously designed to extract as much information as possible without betraying my own state of bewildered ignorance. But when I tried to carry out his plan, it proved quite impracticable. The gate at I stood was unlatched. the banks on either hand were low and apparently most easily scalable, yet I found it by no means possible to effect an entrance into those pleasure-grounds. My attempts to do so were instantly frustrated, repulsed, in a manner which I am totally unable to describe; some strange force, invisible and irresistible as gravitation, arrested every movement in that direction, almost before it had been tele graphed from brain to muscle. In short, a few experiments demonstrated the fact that while I could proceed unchecked to right or left along the shore, I was absolutely prohibited from taking a single step further inland. How far my limits extended to seaward, I naturally did not fully investigate, having once ascertained that the water's edge did not bring me to the end of my tether. It was a sort of converse of King Canute and the waves. Here I was between the deep sea and-I will not say the Devil-but, at any rate, a manifestation of some occult power, such as mankind, during a certain stage of development, is prone to identi fy with that personage. I had been, as it were, set down in a fixed groove, out of which I could no more pass than I

"Having clearly recognized this state of things, I next bethought me of making my presence audible, with a view to at tracting thither the possible guide, philosopher and friend, whom I might not go to seek. This expedient, however, failed even more promptly than the other; I could not utter a sound. Then, like old Joe, 'I took up a stone and I knocked at the gate,' and such is the strength of association, that I continued the process for some time before it dawned upon me that my hammering produced no noise whatever. It is true that soon afterwards a ridiculous-looking small terrier came trotting round the corner; but his bored and indifferent air only too plainly proved his arrival to be non propter hoc. I vainly endeavored to attract his attention, whistling phantom whistles, and slapping my knees, and even going to the lengths of flourishing defiant legs; but the mountain could not have been more disregardful of Mahomet than he of me. And, as if to show that this arose from no natural imperturbability of disposition, he presently saw fit to bark himself hoarse at a flock of sparrows. Altogether it seemed sufficiently obvious that in these new scenes-where and whatever they might be-I was to play the part merely of a spectator, invisible, inaudible, intangible; and, furthermore, that my opportunities for looking on were subject to rigorous circumscription, approaching that experienced by the boy who peers under the edges of the circus-tent and sees the hoofs of the horses. Still, unsatisfactory as 1 might consider this arrangement, I had no resource save to acquiesce therein nor could I under the circumstances think of anything better to do than to keep on loitering about the gate, waiting for whatever might happen next. "What happened next was that a glass door in the house opened, and out of it came two ladies, in one of whom I recognized, as they walked toward me down the slope, my eldest sister Elizabeth. There was nothing in her appearance to make me for a moment doubt her identity, though it did strike me that she looked unusually grave and-yes, decidedly older-and seemed to have lost the pleasant freshness of coloring which mainly constitutes what the Irish call 'pigbeauty.' I was then inclined to attribute this impression to the queer, old-fashioned-looking dress she wore; but I must now suppose her attire to have been Great whatever is to be the latest novelty for that particular summer. The other girl puzzled me much more, for though there was certainly something familiar to me in her aspect, I couldn't fit any name to her uncommonly pretty face and figure; and it wasn't until I heard my sister call her 'Nellie' that the truth occurred to me-it was Helen Rolleston. She, you know, is a sort of cousin of ours, any my mother's ward, and has lived with as most of her life, so there was nothing surprising in finding her and Elizabeth together. The curious and, except upon one hypothesis, unaccountable part of the matter is, that whereas I saw her a few months ago in the guise of an angular, inky-fingered schoolgirl of fifteen or sixteen at most, yesterday she had shot up to twenty or thereabouts, had, I believe, grown several inches, and had undoubtedly turned into a 'come out' young lady. I must say to purchasers and declared by the the work of that famous explorer. that she had improved very much during the transformation; I should Lever have | book may do so notice to that effect. thought Miss Nellie had the makings of such a pretty girl. Not that it is a style I particularly admire; too tall and dark for my taste, and I should be inclined to predict her ultimate development into a fine woman-rather an aversion of mine. but distinctly handsome all the same. "Well, they went about picking flowers for a long time, without coming near enough for me to overhear what they were saying, which I was extremely anxious to do. But at last they came down the path running along inside the boundary-bank, and sat down to sort their roses and pinks on a garden-seat, behind which I found no difficulty in taking up a position well within eavesdropping distance. I'd begun by this time to suspect how matters stood, and was consequently rather uneasy in my mind. One can't find oneself suddenly plumped down five years or so ahead of yesterday, without speculating as to how things—and people -have gone on in the meanwhile. So much may happen in five years. The situation produces the same sort of feeling that I fancy one might have upon finding oneself intact after a ralway accident, and proceeding to investigate who among one's fellow-passengers have held together, what number of limbs they still can muster, and so on. Of course I was not sure that I would learn anything from their conversation; they might have talked for an hour without saying a word to enlighten me; but, as good luck would have it, they were evidently discussing a patch of letters received that morning from various members of the family, about whom I was thus enabled to pick ip many more or less disconnected facts. It appeared, for instance, that my sister Maud was married, and living in South Kensington. My brother Dick, who has just got a naval cadetship, was in comnand of a gunboat somewhere off the Chinese coast. Walter seemed to be dong well on the horse-ranch in the Rockies, which he's hankering after at present-all satisfactory enough. The only thing that made me uneasy was that for some time neither of them mentioned my mother, and it really was an immense said,iny sweet-pea, and the mother always likes a bit for her table;' and Nellie re-

"'Oh yes, nearly gone. There's not the east fear, I should think, that she won't be able to appear on Thursday. That would be indeed unlucky; why, a wedding without a mother-in-law would be nearly as bad as one without a bridegroom, wouldn't it. Nellie?' Nellie laughed and blushed, but expressed no opinion, and Elizabeth went on : 'Talking of that, do you expect Vin. cent this morning?'

"'I don't quite know. He wasn't sure whether his leave would begin to-day or on Wednesday .- that is to-morrow. He said that if he got it to-day, he would look in here on his way to Lowestoft.'

"Oh, on his way; rather a roundabout way from Norwich, I should have thought. Do you know, Nellie, I'm glad that you'll be quartered in York next winter, I believe there's much more going on there than at Norwich, and you 'can ask me to stay with you whenever you are particularly gay. There, now, you've mixed up all the single pirks that I had just carefully sorted from the double ones -what a mischievous young person you are!'
