confused, that's all. Your manner is so and even his accumulated gold tarnished full of hearty old middle age's kind of |-stamped as ill-gotten; least of all could

"Little idiot !" muttered Meeson; "I'll tolerate exposure or even contradiction; give him the sack, too, if he isn't more therefore he had revenged himself. And careful. By Jove! why should I not yet, as he sat there in solitary glory, he have my own resident solicitor? I could realized that to revenge does not bring get a sharp hand with a damaged character for about three hundred pounds a year, and I pay that old Todd quite two thousand pounds. There is a vacant place in the Hutches that I could turn into an office. Hang me if I don't do it. I will make that little chirping grasshopper jump to some purpose, I'll warrant," and he chuckled at the idea.

Just then Mr. Todd returned with the money. will, and before he could begin to make any explanations his employer cut him short with a sharp order to read the gist

This the lawyer proceeded to do. It was very short, and, with the exception an East India missionary the formula of a of a few legacies, amounting in all to simple vegetable remedy for the speedy ESTIMATES FURNISHED about twenty thousand pounds, bequeathed all the testator's vast fortune and es- throat and Lung Affections, also a posi tates, including his (by far the largest) tive and radical cure for Nervous Deinterest in the great publishing house, and his palace, with the paintings and other valuable contents, known as Pompadour Hall, to his nephew, Eustace H.

This done he mixed the little pieces up, threw them on the floor, and stamped upon them with an air of malignity that almost frightened jerky little Mr. Todd. "Now, then," he grimly said, "there's an end of the old love; so let's on with the new. Take your pen and receive my instructions for my will." Mr. Todd did as he was bid.

"I leave all my property, real and personal, to be divided in equal shares between my two partners, Alfred Tom Addison and Cecil Spooner Roscoe. There, that's short and sweet, and, one way and another, it means a couple of millions." "Good heavens! sir," jerked out Mr. Todd. "Why, do you mean to quite cut out your nephew-and the other legatees?" he added, by way of an after-

"Of course I do; that is, as regards my nephew. The legatees may stand as be-

"Well, all I have to say," went on the Ilttle man, astonished into honesty, "is that it is the most shameful thing I ever heard of !"

"Indeed, Mr. Todd, is it? Well, now, Coughs & Colds. may I ask you-am I leaving this property or are you? Don't trouble yourself to answer that, however, but just attend. Either you draw up that will at once, while I wait, or you say good-bye t about two thousand pounds a year, for that's what Meeson's business is worth, I reckon. Now you take your choice."

Mr. Todd did take his choice. In under an hour the will, which was very short, was drawn and engrossed.

"Now then," said Meeson, addressing himself to Mr. Todd and the managing clerk, as he took the quill between his fingers to sign, "do you two bear in mind that at the moment I exocute this will I am of sound mind, memory, and understanding. There you are; now you two witness."

It was night, and King Capital, in the shape of Mr. Meeson, sat alone at dinner in his palatial dining-room at Pompadour. Dinner was over. The powdered footmen had departed with stately tread, and the head butler was just placing the decanters of richly colored wine before this solitary lord of all. The dinner had been a melancholy failure. Dish after dish, the cost of any one of which would have fed a poor child for a month, had been brought up and handed to the master only to be found fault with and sent away. On that night Mr. Meeson had no appetite." "Johnson," he said to the butler when he was sure the footmen could not hear him, "has Mr. Eustace been here?"

"Yes, sir."

"Has he gone?" "Yes, sir. He came to fetch his things and then went away in a cab."

"Where to ?" "I don't know, sir. He told the man to drive to Birmingham."

"Did he leave any message?" "Yes, sir; he bade me say that you should not be troubled with him again, but that he was sorry that you had parted from him in anger."

"Why did you not give me that message before ?" "Because Mr. Eustace said I was not to give it unless you asked after him.

"Very good. Johnson!" "Yes, sir." "You will give orders that Mr. Eustace's name is not to be mentioned in this house again. Any servant mentioning Mr. Eustace's name will be dismiss-"Very good, sir;" and Johnson went. Mr. Meeson gazed round him. He looked at the long array of glass and silver, at the spotless napery and costly flowers. He looked at the walls hung with works of art, which, whatever else they might be, were at least expensive; at the mirrors and the soft wax lights; at the marble mantel-pieces and the bright, warm fires (for it was November); at the rich wall-paper and the soft, deep-hued carpet, and reflected that they were all his. And then he sighed, and his coarse, heavy face sunk in and grew sad. Of what use was this last extremity of luxury to him? He had nobody to leave it to, and, to speak the truth, it gave him but little pleasure. Such pleasure as he had in life was derived from making money, either to sell will please address, "Amateur," not from spending it. The only times | Chatham, N. B.
