up on end. Slowly—very slowly, amid the hideous and despairing shrieks of the doomed wretches on board of her, she lifted her stern higher and higher, and plunged her bows deeper and deeper. They shrieked, they cried to Heaven for help; but Heaven heeded them not, for man's agony can not avert man's doom. Now, for a space, she was standing almost upright upon the water, out of which about a hundred feet of her vast length towered like some monstrous ocean growth, while men fell from her in showsmothered boom of bursting bulk-heads, 6th Prize, Ticket to England and return; she plunged down into the measureless | 7th Prize, Lady's Gold Watch; 8th Prize, deeps, and was seen no more forever.

The water closed in over where she had been, boiling and foaming and sucking down all things in the wake of her last journey, while the steam and poisoned air came up in huge hissing jets and bubbles that exploded into spray on the sur-

the mist once more closed thick and heavy as a pall. They shouted, and once they heard a faint answer, and rowed toward it; but when they got to the spot they could see nothing except some wreckage. They were all dead, their pointing through a fog-dog in the mist, that seemed to grow denser rather than otherwise as the light increased, at a round, boat-like object that had suddenly appeared to the starboard of them.

They rowed up to it; it was a boat, but empty and floating bottom upward. Closer examination showed that it was the cutter, which, when full of women and children, had been fastened to the vessel and dragged down with her as she sunk. At a certain depth the pressure of the water had been too great and had Capital. torn the ring in the bow bodily out of her, so that she returned to the surface. But those in her did not return -at least, not yet. Once more, two or three days hence, they would arise from the watery depths and look upon the skies with eyes that could not see, and then vanish for-

Turning from this a wful and most moving sight, they rowed slowly through Choice Winter Apples! quantities of floating wreckage-barrels, hen-coops (in one of these they found two drowned fowls, which they secured,) and many other articles, such as oars and wicker deck-chairs-and began to shout vigorously in the hope of attracting the of Winter Apples—of choicest qualattention of the survivors in the other ity; Also 50 bbls No. 1 Labrador boat, which they imagined would not be | Herring. far off. Their efforts, however, proved fruitless, owing to the thickness of the fog; and in the considerable sea which wss running it was impossible to see more than twenty yards or so. Also, what between the wind, and the wash and turmoil of the water, the sound of their voices did not travel far. The ocean is a large place, and a row-boat is easily lost sight of upon its furrowed surface; therefore it is not wonderful that, although the two boats were at the moment within half a mile of each other, they never met, and each took its separate course in the hope of escaping the fate of the vessel. The boat in which were Lady Holmhurst and some twenty other passengers, together with the second officer and a crew of six men, after seeing the 'Kangaroo' sink and picking up one survivor, shaped a course for Kerguelen Land, believing that they, and they alone, remained to tell the tale of that awful shipwreck. And here it may be convenient to state that before nightfall they were picked up by a sealing-whaler, that sailed with them to Albany, on the coast of Australia. to encourage farming.
