CHAPTER II. (Continued.) FROM TWO POINTS OF VIEW.

The lord of Redhills was not a bad-hearted man. He had no doubt but that the claimant of the contest had subdued, he offered, through his lawyers, to make the young man a small yearly allowance, or to pay him down a small sum of money to advance him in life. His lawyers—careful men—tacked on to this offer the condition that James Boucher, as he called himself, should sign a document waiving his imaginary rights. The offer was respectfully declined, and the negotiations ended.

Fifteen years afterward the claim was revived. Some fresh evidence was brought forward, which clearly showed that James Boucher's mother believed she was legally married. Yet the one thing was wanting, and without it the case collapsed as before. On this occasion there seemed to be more money behind the claimant, and it transpired that he was now a fairly well-to-do tradesman in a northern town, and who might have done better, people said, had he kept his money in his business instead of spending it in fruitless searches for a record which did not exist, and in paying lawyers to conduct a hopeless case.

But that was his own concern. He was an inoffensive, retiring man. He did not go about trumpeting his wrongs. The strength of his conviction, the steadiness of his purpose, was known only to himself. He was commonly known as Boucher. Probably the friends who had brought him up had discarded the two other letters, as they frequented the name; and in those days he hated the French and hated the name of Boucher, which was good enough to trade under, and would never until he took his own and ousted the younger branch of his family.

Except for the tenacity of his belief that his father and mother were married, James Boucher, or Bouchier, had nothing to distinguish him from the ordinary tradesman. He married one of his own class—a worthy woman, who slightly dipped and often at her husband's expensive manomania. She dared not attempt to dissuade him from one of his mad schemes. His mother died in 1847—died without any liquid interest in which she might have cleared up all doubts. James Boucher had but one child—a son. He was a high-spirited boy, of a roving turn, who, although from his earliest years carefully impressed with the fact that he was the rightful heir to a large estate, troubled little about it, and at the age of eighteen betook himself to America to carve out his own fortune.

Stephen Bouchier was disturbed no more by the preposterous claim. In 1853 he turned his face to the wall and died, outliving his wife by several years. An artistic monument was erected to him in Redton Church, and his son, Philip Tremaine Bouchier, resigned at Redhills in his stead. There were other sons and daughters, but the family tradition of leaving the estate intact to the eldest son was preserved.

Yet, tradition notwithstanding, there were many people who believed that Stephen Bouchier would disinherit his eldest son, Philip, had he not been the best of sons, nor had he led the cleanest of lives. His father had paid large sums of money for him; amounts he could pay without much trouble, but which he disliked having to pay; for he inherited some of the thrifty qualities of the founder of the family. Still, whatever he may have threatened or even intended to do, custom was too strong, and Redhills went the usual way.

Like Prince Hal, Philip, when he succeeded to his kingdom, left the follies of his youth behind him. He married suitably, played the part of a county magnate, made himself fairly popular, and manifested a new trait in the Bouchier character—he became ambitious—politically ambitious. So well-rotted had the family become in Westshire that ten years after his father's death he was elected, without opposition, one of the members for the division of the county in which Redhills is situated.

But that small tradesman with a passion for litigation had not let him rest for once. In 1862 the case was once more before the court—once more lost by the claimant. Fresh and important evidence was threatened; but little was forthcoming—so little that James Boucher's friends marvelled at his folly. But the man knew what he was about. His object was gained by the resurrection of the case, which prevented the case being barred by reason of time, and stopped the so-called younger branch of the Bouchier family being confirmed in the possession of Redhills, by the fact of the estate having been held undisturbed for the period laid down by law as necessary to establish a good title.

Philip Bouchier paid what portion of costs he was called upon to pay, and cursed the base-born tradesman as he drew the check. He, like his father, was convinced that the claim was absurd; yet it annoyed him. Once he had to raise some money on the land, for he was not such a thrifty man as his predecessors, and Parliament meant that lenders were to interest for their money. A gentleman's estate ought to be like Cesar's wife—above suspicion. He had not been troubled by James Boucher since 1862, a small little time ago he heard of the old man's death, so trusted the annoyance and the bother had died with the claimant, for he was now made any sign.

It was just after the happy news of James Boucher's decease that Philip Bouchier made a discovery which converted what had been nothing more than a recurring annoyance into a sword of Damocles. In looking through old family papers, in quest of autographs, for a friend who collected such things, he found a sealed letter addressed to Mrs. Bouchier. It was dated on the very day his uncle lost his life; the writer's sudden death had, no doubt, prevented its being sent to its destination. It began, "My dearest wife," and was signed, "Your affectionate husband, Digby."

These expressions of endearment alone would not have troubled Philip Bouchier much; the terms "husband and wife" might be but words, but one paragraph spoke of the baby, and said how glad the writer was to think that neither father, mother, nor child could ever incur the world's censure, or blush for anything let undone. As he read this paragraph he knew that James Boucher was as legitimate as he was; that his father had been in finding out where the baby was taken place. Redhills would pass from Philip Bouchier to the small tradesman.

Good News!

No one, who is willing to adopt the right course, need be long afflicted with boils, carbuncles, pimples, or other cutaneous eruptions. These are the results of Nature's efforts to expel poisonous and effete matter from the blood, and show plainly that the system is ridding itself through the skin of impurities which it was the legitimate work of the liver and kidneys to remove. To restore these organs to their proper functions, Ayer's Sarsaparilla is the medicine required. That no other blood-purifier will compare with it, thousands testify who have gained from the tyranny of depraved blood by the use of this medicine. For nine years I was afflicted with a skin disease that did not yield to any remedy until a friend advised me to try Ayer's Sarsaparilla. With the use of this medicine the complaint disappeared. It is my belief that no other blood medicine could have effected so rapid and complete a cure."—Andres B. Garcia, C. Victoria, Tamalulpa, Mexico. "My face, for years, was covered with pimples and humors, for which I could find no remedy till I began to take Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Three bottles of this great blood medicine effected a thorough cure. I confidently recommend it to all suffering from similar troubles."—M. Parker, Concord, Vt.
