CHAPTER XII. [Continued.] IN THE GREEN HOUSE. 'How did you like Marguerite?' asked Pierrepont the next day. 'Is she not divine?' 'Yes.' replied Allan, so quietly that his friend wondered at his want of appreciation.

self to express the praise he would have bestowed. 'Do you know anyone who could present me to her?' asked Allan; for Pierrepont knew many people.

'Struck, eh? Well, I don't wonder. Everybody is asking the same question. I wish I did. 'Who is she?' 'No one knows. Some say American.'

'Yes, I know that much.

'Then you should be content; you know nore than most of us.' I wonder if Sinclair knows her, continued Allan, naming a well-known composer with whom he stood on terms of friendship.

'Of course he does-if not he can introduce himself first. He's your man, Allan. Geniuses can dispense with the usual forms of society. I wish I were a geniue, 'It's foolish to wish for impossibilities,' said Allan.

Yet, was he not wishing for an impo bility? It might be so; but he could not help his fate; and at four-and-twenty there is little a man thinks beyond the bounds of possibility. At that age one is not prone to At first Allan had some wild idea of writing to Frances and asking permission to call upon her, but he shrank from this course. He was not a distinguished man whom the artist might be pleased to meet. He was simply an English gentleman, and he felt he could scarzely base his claim to her favorable consideration either on the fact that he had been her fellew-traveller for a few hours or that he was deeply in love with her. The latter would be even a weaker an introduction; and, if so, will you do it, if plea than the former; and, knowing the world, or the London world, Allan frauned as he thought that by this time many had told her or shown her the same thing. No, he must wait until he could find some one who could present him, or until they met together under some friend's roof. It was the woman, not the singer, he was seeking to make acquaintance with. Meanwhile he could at least go and hear her every time she appeared in public. That was his undeniable right and privilege, of which he partook to such an extent, that for the next fortnight a choleric nature. whenever Mdlle. Francesca charmed an audience there was one worng fellow in it who listened as though he would monopolize all her magic sounds, and who gazed so ardently at the singer that had she been aware of it she might have been greatly discomposed. Frances had now appeared several times in grand operas, and was announced as one of the great attractions at an important concert-her first appearance in Eggland except on the stage. Allan Bourdeier was in at young-men who moved in good society. tendance as usual. So regular had he been 'You wait here; I'll be back in a few minin putting in an appearance whenever she sang that Pierrepout bantered him womercifully on the devotion he displayed to the new star-the more so as he found he had not, as yet, succeeded in getting the coveted introduction. The concert was held in one of the largest halls in London. There were several queens and kings of song there, so the honors were divided. Every queen had her subjects, and when each reigned so successfully the palm could be adjudged to none. In the first part Francesca sang one song and in a duet. To say the least, she was as enthusiastically received as her contemporary sovereigns. Had the sovereignty been dependent on personal appearance, no doubt would have been entertained as to whom it the concert-hall is, to a layman, always inshone out conspicuous. Her rivals were as candles befere the sun. She needed so arch gestures, no pretty and petulant by-play, to impress her audience in her favor. She is about to be introduced to the temporary looked what she was, whether on or off the stage-a queen among women, Her dress. one of the before-mentioned Parisian masterpieces, suited her exactly, Let me attempt to describe it. A rich satin-a demod-colored satin; the front trimmed profacely with white lace and pearl embroidery. It was after the fashion of the day, tight to the figure, and let who will complain of the trying style, Mdlle. Francesca had no occasion to fear as to the symmetry of the form it shadowed forth. The skirt terminated in a train of portentous length; the bodice was cut square, and rewealed the dazzling whiteness of her neck, our which rested a diamond pendant, attached to a necklace, consisting of a single row of large pearls. On one shoulder was a large bunch of dark purple pansies. The contrast of these with the lemon-colored dress had striking and admirable effect. Her earrings were diare a solitaires, while other diamonds were arranged in cunning places in her thick, saft, brown hair. Gloves, the exact color of her dress and fastened by a number of bettons, covered her rounded arms-alas for the exigencies of fashion!hiding their beauty and whiteness. If ary lady who reads this feels any doubt about the ravishing effect of this triumph of millinery, let her order a similar a ress and she will not be disappointed with the resultespecially if she be as beautiful as Mdlle. Francesca. Frances was one of those women who seemed to be especially designed to wear jewelry. There are some hands on which the smallest circlet of gold loaks more than is necessary; others who may cover every finger to the knuckle with gems, yet appear in faultless taste. Simple as Frai ces was in her habits, her style was the grand style- rich clothing became her. The diamonds on her neck, her arms, and in her ears seemed in their proper place. It was got that she needed such decorations, but they suited her; and knowing the value of ostward display with the public, she had invested a portion of her capital in precious stenes. Altogether her appearance and attire were admired nearly as much as her

Perhaps Allan was the only man in the room who did not appreciate those gems. Somehow diamonds on the stage are suspicious possessions. People wonder if they are presents-if so, by whom given, and why? Speculations of this kind have the effect of investing the wearer with a piquant interest. had he known those sparkling stones had storative tonic and purifier.

He was quite resolved that, when h made her his wife, those presents should be returned to their respective donors. He was a determined and sanguine yourg man, looking into the future hopefully, and with the confidence of youth.

Allan's friend, Mr. Alfred Sinclair, the well-known composer, was at the concert; he had enjoyed the first part greatly, and expected to enjoy the second part even more, as the programme for this was of a more popular nature, and included two of his own The fact was that he could not trust himsongs. Mr. Sinclair had that morning finished a very exquisite setting to some very sentimental words, and was anxious that Mdlle. Francesca should "take up" the song, as it is called. Only composers and music pablishers know what a prima donna "taking up" a ballad means, or how by such a kindly yet well-paid act on her part the sale a great many thousand copies is assured. Mr. Sinclair had naturally made Mdlle. Francesca's acquaintance, and was now wishing to make an appointment with her, to show her his melodious effort and to enlist her sympathies on behalf of this tuneful off-spring of his genius. So, in the interval between the parts, he was hurrying to the green-room to prefer his request, A hand

Sinclair meant no disrespect, singers being usually spoken of by their surnames pure and simple, without prefix, 'You know her, then?' asked Allan,

'Of course I do, my dear fellow--why Mr. Sinclair's accent implied that it would be absurd to suppose that any singer could rise to eminence without, as a necessity, being well acquainted with a person af such distinction in the musical world as himself, 'Do you know her well enough to give me

I ask it as a particular favor?' Sinclair shook his head. 'I can't say I should like to presume or our acquaintance, which is purely artistic as far as that. You see, Bourchier, you're not a poet, or a painter, or a musician. 'But I am very anxious to know her.' 'So is every one. Better wait until you meet her at the house of one of your grand friends. It will be better taste.' Allan felt annoyed, but dare not show at the risk of offending Sinclair, who was of 'Will you ask her permission?' he said.

'There can be no harm in that.'

'Of course, I will,' answered Sinclair, who was glas to oblige every one, particularly a member of a rich old country family.

He plunged through a door which led, it seemed, under the stage, and Allan waited hopefully. That dingy, painted door might have been the gate of heaven for his Presently Sinclair returned.

What did she say?' asked Allan. "Said yes, of course or I shouldn't have ome back for you.' 'Nothing else ?' 'No, but she smiled. By Jove, what a wonderful smile that girl has!'

Allan, trying to lock self-possessed and

'All right; come along,' he said.

The "green room" either of the theatre or vested with a kind of mysterious awe-a feeling which has been sometimes known to surround it even as long as to the third visit paid to its sacred precincts. It is when one abode of those radiant and gifted creatures who ravish eyes and ears by their performances, that one feels most acutely the insignificance of one's own station in life. Who is he that he should dare to tread the hallowed ground, should presume to breathe the same air as those whose names are world renowned? Then it is true that a private gentleman of modest disposition wishes he had written a successful book, painted a grand picture, crossed the channel in balloon, been the hero of four divorce cases, invented a patent medicine, or, in fact, done anything to lend his name enough Instre to justify his intrusion. It is only when he begins to realize the fact that the thrilling sopranos, the rich contraltos, the sentimental tenors, and the massive baritones are in private, or even semi-private, life, very much like ordinary men and women, that he feels at all at his ease. Alas! when this takes place-when that comfortable state of mind begins-very often the attraction, the fascination, the mystery of the green-room is past and another illusion gone over to the majority. . .
