The girl gave him her hand, while an amused smile played over her lips. 'I am glad to see you,' she said, 'I told you we should meet again. It was presumptuous to discount success -was it not?'

She was so natural that Allan felt at home with her at once. They might have been on the steamboat, with the wind blowing, and the merry sea dancing around. Perhaps he wished they were.

He told her how astonished, how delighted he had been to recognize her, and thanked her for allowing Sinclair to conduct him to her presence.

'Not at all. I am pleased to be able to thank you properly for the care you took of me across the channel. Now sit down, and let us talk. My next song is a long way He sat on the red-covered bench beside her. He was only too glad to find that she greeted him like an old friend. 'What a success you have been!' he said.

'I must congratulate you.' 'Thank you. I have been very fortunate and people very kind.'

'What a career before you! I little thought to whom I was talking when first we met. Yet you seem little changed.'

'I am not changed,' said Frances, simply. 'But your life must be changed.' 'It was what I always looked forward to -what I studied and wished for.'

'Do you like it ?' I love my art. I love to stand on the stage and know that I am moving people's minds. You were pleased, I could see.'

'You saw me, then?' Allan could scarcely restrain showing his delight in his voice. 'Of course, I saw you-several times. 1 passed you once in the street; just before I appeared first. I had a great mind to send you a ticket.'

'I wish you had. Why did you not?' 'For several reasons—the most weighty of which was not knowing your name.' You know it now. May I hope you will Introductions are inevitable, and the man of high rank who wishes to pay his homage to a particularly bright operatic star cannot in policy be denied. So, many came and paid their homage; and judging her by others of her kind, thought the greater amount of incense they burned the more acceptable it would be. They were mistaken. Not that she was indifferent to praise. Given by a Gounod, a Wagner, a Rubinstein, or anyone whose name stamped the approbation with worth, it would have been delicious to her. To others she was indifferent. She built her hopes as to the reality and atability of her success upon the general verdict given by her audiences. To the single voice she was careless. She came down smiling, followed by the accompanist. Still the applause continued, so she had to turn and appear again. There was little room for turning at the bottom of the stairs, and her maid waited there to perform the simple operation of rearranging her train as she went up. Allan noticed it.
