Covering the Face with Disfiguring, Painful Blotches, Cured by Cuticura Remedies, About seven years ago I had a humor break out upon my face; it started in a small blotch and looked like the sting of a bee, then it spread and looked like a ringworm, and became very painful. I at once went to one of the best doctors in the city, and he could do me no good. No less than twelve of the best doctors have had a trial at my face, and all of them failed. I will not give you a list of their names, but will say that they were from Boston, New York, and Maine, also from England, France, and Canada. I have teen a hotel cook and steward for years. CHAPTER XVII. Derwent ever afterward declare I that nother simply and absolutely fell in lov with Don Maurizio at first sight. There could be no doubt that she was as favorable impressed as he could have desired with the handsome man whose perfect blending of worldly polish and frank cordiality could not have failed to charm even the least suscepti ble to the effect of manner. Sibyl did not hesitate to affirm that she had never before seen so princely a man, and that the admirable results of a wound in the shoulder were daily becoming more apparent to her. Do Maurizio, on his part, was evidently muc pleased with Derwent's friends, -with Mrs. Derwent's delicate refinement and Sibyl's spirited charm. He was most courteously prompt in paying his respects, accompanying Derwent, who lost no time in seeking him back to the hotel for that purpose. Hi daughter, he said, would give herself the pleasure of calling later, and hoped ladies would drive with her on the Pase that afternoon. 'For myself,' he said, sometimes take out an English dog-cart, and if either, or both, of you gentlemen will accept a seat with me, I shall be very happy." th invitations were accepted, and, ing Mrs. Derwent's renewed thanks for he son's great debt of kindness, the statel haciendado bowed himself away. But, if Don Maurizio had awakened enthusiam in the breasts of these explorers from the States, what can be said of the effect which Dona Zarifa produced, with her surpassing beauty enhanced by a toilet fresh from the hands of the most consummate artist in Paris? Derwent, who had found that he could not trust himself to speak of her, had said very little of her persona charms, and so Sibyl's eyes turned upon him with a look of amazement and interrogation which almost provoked him to laughter. 'What did you mean by not preparing us for such a vision as this?' the look said And indeed that perfect face, framed by hat which was a mass of soft, curling plumes, was enough to provoke the inquiry. Yet to Derwent's eyes nothing could ever frame it so well as the graceful Spanish drapery in which he had seen it first, a though he was glad that these critical fem nine eyes should behold his princess in Great is the effect of wealth. Who de not know this? Yet, to a nature not readil or deeply impressed by the accidents of li its wonderful effect is a standing marve which custom cannot stale. Derwent said to himself that if Dona Zarifa had bee stripped of every accessory of fortune he noble beauty and still more noble character would have been none the less evident to him, and none the less adorable in his eyes. Perhaps he was right,-though the test would be a severe one, even for a lover. but at least he had no reason to expect find such eyes in others. There was noth ing surprising in the fact that Mrs. Derwent was more struck by the surroundings of the young heiress than by her remarkable love liness. The luxurious carriage which awaitposition and wealth of the people with whon his good fortune had associated him. As he ed them, with its handsome horses, liveried servants, and every appointment perfect as if for Hyde Park, brought home to her more vividly than all of Derwent's words the passed the equipage on the Paseo, Derwent could not but smile at the expression of h mother's face as she lay back on the softly. cushioned seat, regarding with a look of perfect satisfaction the brilliant scene of what she was a part.

He was not surprised that, when they met at dinner, Sibyl's enthusiastic admiration overflowed all verbal bounds.

'She is simply the most beautiful creature that I have ever seen !' she said, referring to Zarifa. 'I really did nothing but stare at her; for she is a perfect picture of lovel ness. And when her eyes light up, and she makes that fascinating little Mexican salu tation with the fingers, she is utterly bewitching. Geoffrey, if you were to swear until you were black in the face that you did not fall in love with her when you were out at their place, I should not believe you

There was no need for me to subject myself to such an unpleasant test, then, Siby answered Geoffrey, calmly. 'But I may l allowed to remark that it would be as sensi ble for me to fall in love with a royal princess as with Dona Zarifa. She is the great est heiress in Mexico, and will no doul

'I really do not see,' observed Mrs. Der went, 'why it should be supposed that Geoffrey would hesitate to offer himself to any woman, even if she is a great heires No one who knows him could suspect him of an interested motive, and he has sufficient fortune of his own---'

'My dear mother,' interposed Derwent with a gallant attempt to laugh, 'the matte has not reached the point of even a contemplated proposal. I have the honor to admire Dona Zarifa exceedingly, but beyond that my presumption does not venture.'

'I am unable to perceive where the question of presumption comes in,' said Mrs Derwent, majestically. Derwent did not reply, for he was indeed partly amused and partly irritated to perceive that his mother, having been disappointed in her long-cherished hope of seeing have resisted the desire,—partly because I him marry Sibyl Lenox, had now conceived the brilliant idea of an alliance with Dona Zarifa. magnificence, in the city of Mexico. Derwent had admired its great sculptured portal and taken a glance into its spacious court when he had been in the capital first, but he did not appreciate all its stately beauty until he entered and saw the whole effect of the interior, which was at once fortress-like in its solidity and graceful in architectural detail as a vision of the Orient. Around the mmense inner court, set with orange-trees and flowering shrubs and musical with the murwur of a fountain, were the domestic offices, while above, resting on Moresque arches that sprang from slender, clustered pillars, was the gallery, reached by two sweeping flights of marble steps, on which the family apartments opened, A king might have found himself not unfitly lodged in such a dwelling, Derwent thought, as he followed the servant who had received his card up the great staircase and into an apartment which reminded him of Don Maurizio's 100m at Miraflores. There was the same business-like air about this apartment, although it was more luxurious in its appointments than the one at the hacienda.

> paper, held out his hand in greeting. 'Mr. Derwent,' he said, when they were both seated, 'I have a confession to make, as a preface to a business proposal, and I be quite frank in making it. Briefly, then, when you recovered from your wound in my house, and when I found that the stranger I had succored as a matter of charity proved to be a gentleman and a person of whom one might wish to make a friend, I remem. bered prudence, and I felt that befere admitting you to friendly intimacy I should know something about you as you are known at home. And that, as I am well aware, is what I seemed to you. Well,'he smiled slightly, -'I suppose you made some inquiries about me?'

'Yes. I wrote to an old friend, a man of the highest position, in New Orleans. Well, my friend's reply was so flattering that some day I will show it to you. Only one thing in his letter puzzles me a little, After speaking of your social position and your personal character in the highest terms, he mentions that you have recently inherited from your father a large estate. Yet, notwithstanding this, am I mistaken in believing that you have come to Mexico to make money in rather perilous ventures?' 'You are not mistaken,' Derwent replied, whose resolution to be perfectly candid was taken with a quickness which surprised himself. 'I have lately inherited a considerable estate from my father, and I have also come to Mexico to endeavor to make money in ventures which I hope may not prove perilous. If you were not so kind, I should hesitate before intruding my private affairs me explain, why I have found it necessary better than B.B.B. to take this step.'

When the story was finished he held out his hand. 'I will do my best to help you, Mr. Derwent,' he said. And no other expression of confidence was necessary,

'Now,' he added, after Derwent had expressed his thanks, 'let us consider the best means of helping you, -that is, of enabling you to accomplish your end in the shortest time possible. And here comes in my business pooposal. You were, I believe, very favorably impressed with the value of the Buena Esperanza?'

'I have never seen a better mine,' Derwent answered. 'Nothing is needed but the proper application of scientific methods to realize a great fortune from it. But I have understood that Senor Barrera will not sell. 'He will not, but the other owners will. Their share of the mine has been offered to me. That bond has now been cancelled, and before I left Miraflores Barrera renewed the old proposal to me. I asked him if he was willing to transfer the offer to you, and he agreed to do so. Now, Mr. Derwent, this is a chance which does not occur every day,-not even in Mexico. What do you think of it?'

'Simply one thing.' replied Derwent, without a moment's hesitation, - 'that I accept it gratefully. I confess that it changes my plans materially; for my original intention was not to work mines in Mexico, but No complaints can be heard or changes made after April 30th 1891. to sell them.
