he wanted had been forthcoming. Receptly he had been thinking a great deal about Frances. He guessed the time was at hand when she would appear in public ; and, upon seeing the announcement of Mdlle. Francesca's coming debut, concluded that Frances and the new singer were identical. Meeting with her was a danger he must guard against ; although he felt a longing to see her, to hear her once more. He dared not hope she would forget him. He knew that, if chance brought them face to face, she would insist upon an explanation as to the manner of her father's death. This explanation would entail others which would be embarrassing to Mr. Digby Bourchier. So all he could do was to shun her. It was not a difficult task. Except in the street. they were unlikely to meet. His companions and friends were not of the class which entertains prime donne. future spoiled and closed in by the one foolish act of a girl. As to the rest of her family, Mr. Bourchier had for a long time been in bad health. I should be wrong in saying that it was caused by remorse for his crime. There must be many a murderer in the world who eats, drinks, sleeps as well as you or I do. He had done the deed in cold blood-had done it to benefit himself and his children. If for a while his victim's face haunted his dreams, it began at last to fade from them. Had George Manders not made his discovery, and used it for his own ends, it is probable that after a time Philip Bourchier would have ceased to think of his crimewould even, when all danger of discovery seemed past, have rejoiced that he bad found the opportunity, and had been able to nerve himself to establish his right to his inheritance by one desperate but successful stroke. No, it was not remorse that made him an old man before his time. It was fear-it was the sword which the impostor held always over his head. It was regret at the price paid as hnsh-money-Josephine's happiness. It was dread lest the sword might some day fall-it was the worry of having to keep up a continual fight with the wielder of it-to dare him do his worst, then to tremble lest be should be taken at his word-to pay the blackmail, yet strive to

It was the horror of thinking that some day his wife and the children he loved might be forced to look upon him as a murderer. Surely, leaving what remorse there might be out of the question, Philip Bourchier found enough in these things to break his full benefit to which it entitled him. He health.

Sleeplessness was the root of the evil. Without artificial aid he could not sleep; and a man must sleep, die, or go mad. He He did not resign himself to being a thrall to the chloral fiend without many a struggle. But what did they avail? Let him lie down and say, I will wait sleep until she comes. Thoughts, thoughts, thought came, but not sleep. Then he must give in and swallow a dose of the deadly drug. Only his wife knew what a quantity of it he had been taking during the past months. They tell me chloral destroys the body, but not the mind. It would, perhaps, have been well for Philip Bourchier had its effects been equal as to each. He was a man of strong will; he fought hard against his master. He plunged into politics in a way that steady Conservative squires are seldom in the habit
